Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman's party has a very easy and simple method to satisfy my fears on this score. They can wait upon the Executive and have him approve, if they have that much influence with him, the constitution of Arizona. But, in view of the fact that no such action has been taken, I am not in a position to further answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Colorado said a moment ago that the constitution of Arizona was progressive and the constitution of New Mexico was reactionary.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I did.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman comes from a State that has in its constitution a provision granting franchise to women.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; by amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The constitution of Arizona limits the franchise to the male citizen.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It does.

Mr. MONDELL. The constitution of New Mexico grants, not full franchise, but very considerable right of franchise to women. Is that one of the reactionary provisions in the New Mexico constitution which the gentleman had in mind?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not think New Mexico grants sufficient franchise to women to hurt them any; just school elections, and a majority of the male voters may by petition deprive them of that small privilege. So far as the constitution of Arizona is concerned, I am not in favor of that provision. I am sorry that a people who demonstrate themselves to be so thoroughly progressive in every other particular were not broad enough to give women what my State and your State has given them, the unqualified right of franchise.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to approve the Arizona constitution as being thoroughly progressive.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to his colleague [Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado]?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is through. I think he has squared himself with the lady vote in Wyoming for the next campaign, and does not care to interrupt me any further at this juncture. [Laughter.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to permit a brief question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I ask for information. Does the proposed constitution of Arizona provide that a majority may amend?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. A majority vote may amend the constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; a majority of the legislature may submit an amendment and a majority of the people voting on the question may adopt it.

Now, I take the position, which I stated to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] with reference to Arizona feeling that it is just as much entitled to admission at this time as New Mexico; that its admission is jeopardized by prejudice against a certain provision in its constitution; and that after New Mexico was safely gotten into the fold, Arizona might be left out in the cold until such time as its people saw fit to adopt, not the kind of constitution they wanted, but the kind of constitution that somebody here in Washington wanted, or thought they ought to have. As I said in the beginning, events in another body have indicated that this fear was well founded, because of the action that occurred there when, by motion, the constitution of Arizona was added to the resolution approving New Mexico, and the entire resolution failed, when there can be very little doubt that had the resolution come before that body for New Mexico alone, it would have been adopted, as it was in this House.

UNDER ENABLING ACT CONGRESS DIVIDED ITS CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS WITH PRESIDENT.

At the time of the passage of the resolution through this House in the last Congress admitting New Mexico, I examined the enabling act and expressed the opinion that it was devised to give the President alone the power to admit or reject the proposed States of Arizona and New Mexico, whereas, under the Constitution, that is peculiarly and solely within the province of Congress, and that the President having approved the constitution of New Mexico, it would become a State, unless both Houses of Congress affirmatively disapproved the constitution of New Mexico during the next regular session of Congress, which would be the session beginning in December next. This I understand to be the view taken by those who are deeply concerned for the admission of New Mexico, but not so much concerned about Arizona, and in that connection I want to quote briefly from the hearings before the committee, in which Judge Fall, the able and brilliant proponent, and, some say, the author, of the New Mexico constitution, was appearing in its behalf before the Committee on Territories. I asked Judge Fall whether the Attorney General of the United States had indicated to him what would constitute a disapproval of these constitutions by Congress and whether he indicated, in his opinion, what would be the result finally if only the House disapproved of one of these constitutions and the other body simply failed to act upon it. Judge Fall replied that he did not.

I simply presumed from the conversation with him that that would be a failure of Congress to act; that the action of Congress would be the action of both Houses, and I think that was his idea; if either House should disapprove and the other not disapprove, that would be a failure to act, and, as he stated, all you have to do is to rest easy and New Mexico comes in automatically. You will simply have to wait for it.

That, says Judge Fall, is what the Attorney General of the United States told him. It may be that the water has run by the mill. It may be that this resolution, which is tantamount to a disapproval of the constitutions of Arizona and New Mexico until the conditions specified in the resolution have been complied with, will fail of passage, and thus will New Mexico, with its antiquated form of constitution, become a State of the Union, while Arizona will remain a Territory as the penalty of its courage, independence, and advanced political thought. I do not believe that this will be the case. I know it ought not to be the case, but that the action proposed by the pending resolution is so fair that it ought to appeal to both bodies of Congress and receive the approval of the President, thus securing statehood without delay to both Territories.

NO OBJECTION MADE TO ARIZONA CONSTITUTION.

Now, the sessions of the committee were entirely occupied with the consideration of the provisions of the New Mexico constitution. No one appeared in criticism of or in opposition to the constitution of Arizona. Not one single objection, I believe, has ever been lodged with the present Committee on Territories from any source in the Territory of Arizona, or outside of it, for that matter, against the constitution that was adopted by the people of Arizona. It is from Washington, not from Arizona, that objection comes to the Arizona constitution. The spokesman of the Arizona delegation said in a few words that if the Arizona constitution contained any provision or any number of provisions upon which the committee thought the people of Arizona should have an opportunity to act independently of the great question of statehood, which might naturally have inclined them to accept their constitution whether they liked it or not, Congress might resubmit the provision or provisions to a vote of the people of Arizona.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Now that Arizona is likely to come into the Union, and there is no objection there now, why ought not Congress to admit her and give her the right to become a State without delay?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think Congress ought to do so, but, unfortunately for Arizona, this matter seems to have been so shaped up that Congress has seen fit to divide its powers with another department of the Government, a division of power, by the way, it has been suggested, and I think properly, which is not binding upon the Congress and finds no sanction whatever in the Constitution.

HOW CONGRESS HAS DIVIDED POWERS WITH PRESIDENT.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Perhaps I did not understand the gentleman's statement correctly, but it has been my understanding that heretofore the admission of States has been provided ordinarily in enabling acts, and in those acts we have said that if the constitution presented is republican in form, in harmony with the enabling act, and not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence, then the President shall make proclamation, but we have not called upon the Congress to take any action in the premises heretofore——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think that is true.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman just stated, in response to the question of the gentleman from California, that we had divided our authority with the President. As a matter of fact, we have left it with the Executive heretofore under the enabling act.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; we have divided the authority in this way, that heretofore upon the presentation by an enabled Territory to the President of a constitution that was republican in form he must issue his proclamation——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Precisely. Republican in form and with various other requirements.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, we have provided in this enabling act, in addition to the ordinary requirements, for the submission of these constitutions to the President and to Congress for their approval or disapproval. We have heretofore given direction to the President, on the submission to him of a constitution republican in form and not contrary to the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the Federal Constitution, to issue his proclamation, but in this enabling act we say that Congress and the President shall have the power to approve or disapprove the constitutions themselves, an entirely novel proposition. Now, what does that mean? Is it not thereby intended to give a much wider range to the consideration of constitutions than heretofore? Is not that what the President is acting upon when he assumes the right to withhold approval from the constitution of Arizona simply because there is one single feature in it that he thinks is unwise and impolitic, but which he can not claim to be unrepublican? Now, Congress always has this power. Congress inherently had this power to approve or disapprove a constitution submitted to it by any Territory. The Federal Constitution gives it all power, and the President never had any power until the Congress sought to confer it upon him by this enabling act.

Mr. LITTLETON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. LITTLETON. For information I would ask the gentleman if there is any other State in the Union which has provided for the general power of recall such as is proposed in the Arizona constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe while this movement for the recall is growing and finds favor in a great many States, that Arizona has gone somewhat further in that regard than any other portion of the country.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think Arizona has gone any further than Oregon has, for here is the Oregon provision, which provides for the recall of all of its officers, including its judiciary, and especially mentions the supreme court judges; so I think Oregon has gone as far as Arizona in the recall provision in its constitution.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman compared the Oregon provision with the provision of the proposed constitution of Arizona? Is there any difference except a few words? Are not they both practically the same and both contain practically the same provisions?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD, yes.

EFFECT OF PASSAGE OF RESOLUTION.

Mr. RAKER. Now, may I just ask a further question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Under this joint resolution, did the committee hold that if it passed the House and Senate the President would admit New Mexico without putting Arizona through?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, that particular question was not discussed. I have been of the opinion, if the gentleman just wanted my opinion, that if the House passed this resolution and the Senate did not, when the next regular session of Congress adjourns New Mexico will be a State and Arizona will not be; but if the resolution goes through both Houses substantially as we have drafted it, it works a disapproval of both constitutions by Congress and nullifies the President's approval of New Mexico. Our position is that the amendment we have proposed to each of these constitutions is tantamount to a disapproval of them, and neither of them will be States, unless the President approves the resolution. It will then be up to the President, who must take both or neither.

Mr. RAKER. One more question. Oregon has already adopted this recall of judges. The State of California has proposed a like amendment. What we want to know now is whether or not we are having a republican form of government, and if you keep out Arizona because it is not a republican form of government, what are you going to do with Oregon, and with California if they adopt these amendments? And why should we in advance say to the President, "We are afraid of you," and not put right up to him the measure to be passed upon, with New Mexico and Arizona together?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say this: That personally, from a political standpoint, I would not ask any better issue before the people of this country to-day than to have the President of the United States give his approval to the reactionary constitution of New Mexico and veto the progressive constitution of Arizona. But I am not injecting my personal prejudices and opinions into the proposed action of the committee, which was taken simply to meet the objection of the President and with the approval of the people of Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish the gentleman would clear me up on this proposition.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is the proposition?

COMMITTEE DID NOT PASS ON MERITS OF RECALL.

Mr. MURDOCK. The proposition is contained in this joint resolution in the matter of the recall. The joint resolution proposes that there shall be submitted to the voters of New Mexico a proposed amendment to their constitution, namely, a provision for a recall, with the judiciary excepted, the voter to vote for——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; Arizona. The voter to vote either for or against this proposed amendment in the joint resolution. Now, if the majority of the voters in Arizona vote against this proposed amendment in the joint resolution, then does the original provision in the constitution of Arizona for the recall of the judiciary remain intact?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is our purpose and understanding.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is set forth in the resolution itself.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes. It is as clearly prescribed in the resolution as we were able to prescribe it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I understand that the constitution of Arizona will stand as it was originally drafted, with the recall of the judiciary, if this proposed amendment is voted down?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It will. And I will say to the gentleman further that the only difference between this section as it stands in the resolution and as it stands in the constitution is that we have inserted five words, "except members of the judiciary." We have just inserted those five words in the substitute proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are we to take that to mean that the majority members of the committee are against the recall of the judiciary? I will state to the gentleman that I am for the recall of the judiciary, with proper initiative safeguards. Are we to take this to mean that the majority members of the Committee on Territories of this House are against the recall provision?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; it is not entitled to any such construction, because the committee did not go into the merits of that proposition. We never divided on the question as to whether the recall was desirable or undesirable. We simply accepted the proposition of the people of Arizona, took them at their word, that they were willing to have this question resubmitted to them, and we sought thereby to meet the objection of the President; and that is the only purpose we had in the world.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] to the reason given by the committee for this amendment in the report they made to the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have read it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The report says:

> The controlling reason for proposing this change was the objection of the President of the United States to the recall provision, so far as it applies to the judiciary.

It does not voice the sentiments of a majority of the committee. We simply take conditions as we find them and in our desire to get the resolution through and give statehood to both Territories we have put such provisions in as we believe will meet the varying views and bring about the enactment of this joint resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia, with the permission of the gentleman from Colorado, if he does not think that this new provision in the joint resolution will rather predispose the people of Arizona to vote down the recall of the judiciary merely for the purpose of getting in?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. They do not have to vote it down; they can vote it up or vote it down.

Mr. MURDOCK. They can not vote it up and get in.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There is no condition except that they shall vote on it; that is the only condition we attach.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the majority members of this committee do not inform me or the House as to their individual opinion on the recall of the judiciary.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am going to tell the gentleman what mine is, if I get a chance.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman for or against it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am for it. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask if it is the intention of the committee to request the people of Arizona to vote on the question of the recall of the judiciary only and not as to other officers?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is the proposition; the judiciary only.

Mr. FOWLER. Why should there be any distinction made between the recall of one officer as distinguished from another?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that I do not make any distinction. I propose to notice that question very briefly if I have time. I only mention it now as another evidence of the fact that the work of this committee was not the opinion of any one man, that we arrived at what appeared to be a reasonable solution of the main issue involved to meet the objections of the President, and to which the Arizona delegation readily assented.

Mr. FOWLER. One question more. Do I understand the resolution indorses the recall as to all other officers than that of the judiciary?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, I think our minority brethren have done that by the language they employ in the report, which I hope to give some attention to if I ever get to it.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know why the judiciary should receive any distinction above that of any other officer in the State?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I trust the chairman of the committee will give the gentleman time on that proposition, and I think I can assure him in advance, from the tenor and tone of his questions, that our views are not materially different on that proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. I am asking for information. I want to know what provision of the constitution discriminates in favor of a judge as against a constable? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want the gentleman to get after these gentlemen who are opposed to the recall of the judiciary with that question when they get the floor.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If I have time.

Mr. BOWMAN. If this resolution prevails and the people of Arizona vote on the question and determine that they will or will not have the recall, the Territory would be admitted in either instance?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It will be admitted whichever way they vote.

Mr. BOWMAN. The only purpose is to let them consider whether they were right in the first instance?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Exactly. I will say to the gentleman that it is usually claimed in the adoption of all constitutions that in the overwhelming desire for statehood the people will swallow anything in the way of a constitution, and that they will accept provisions which they never would accept if disassociated from the consideration of statehood, and it is to meet that proposition that we propose to give them a chance to vote again.

Mr. BOWMAN. What objection is there to passing the resolution in its present form and giving them the opportunity of one more vote? That is all there is to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not understand why the gentleman's side of the House does not see it in that light. I trust that we will have the support of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman will certainly have my support.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask one further question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will yield to a further question.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask for information whether or not the President contends that if Arizona is required to frame its constitution omitting the recall of judges, if he contends that Arizona can not amend its constitution after it becomes a State incorporating the recall of judges?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that he has just spoiled one more good thing in my speech [laughter], because I take the position that if the people of Arizona are required to go through the senseless formality insisted upon by the minority in their report, that they shall be required to vote and vote favorably on this amendment as a condition precedent to statehood, I would not blame them a particle if they went to the polls and voted the exemption of the judiciary into their constitution at the first election, and then at the next election, as they undoubtedly may do, vote it out again. I do not believe they are ever going to vote in the exemption in the first place.

ATTITUDE OF ARIZONA COMMENDABLE.

I have referred to the action of the Arizona delegation in coming before our committee and taking the broad position that we could submit one or any number of the provisions of their constitution that we saw fit back to a vote of the people; and I think that the action of the Arizona delegation may be commended, even at this late day, to the proponents of the New Mexico constitution. We do not say to them, no more do we say to the people of Arizona, you must accept the proposed amendment to your constitution, but we merely say, you must vote on this proposition; and I am curious to know what is at the bottom of the opposition of the advocates of the New Mexico constitution, which is no more theirs than is the Arizona constitution that of the Arizona delegation, which took such a liberal position.

The New Mexico delegation was divided into two camps in the hearings before our committee, one being Republican in membership, advocating the constitution as it now stands, although some of them privately conceded the fairness of submitting to the people of New Mexico an amendment to the article on amendments, rendering their constitution less difficult to amend, while at one stage of the hearings all of the delegation to which I am now referring appeared favorable to such a proposition. What influence caused them later to change their minds I am unable to say, but if I had only one guess I would without hesitation say politics. I would say politics and the whispered word that went down the line from some high source here in Washington that New Mexico is to come in and Arizona is to stay out, not only on account of her form of constitution, but for some other reasons. The other delegation, Democratic in membership, excepting one lone insurgent Republican, who found no response in the hearts of the minority on that committee, criticized different features of the New Mexico constitution, and were a unit on the proposition that it ought to be made more easily amendable.

I propose to criticize it myself, showing wherein upon the face of that instrument and irrespective of anything that has been said before the committee, and for that matter without even referring to the testimony in the hearings, the necessity exists for giving the people of New Mexico an opportunity to act upon this matter, if it is to be assumed that there is any such progressive spirit among the people of that Territory—and I think there is—as is now moving the people of this whole country irrespective of party, and is indeed more pronounced in the Republican than in the Democratic States of this Union.

Whence come the prophets of the rule of the people? It strikes me I have heard much of the Iowa idea and the Oregon plan, not to mention revolutions in Oregon and Washington and California and elsewhere. In fact, Oklahoma seems to be about the only up-to-date Democratic State at the present time.

NEW MEXICO DEMOCRATS NOT OPPOSING STATEHOOD.

But before proceeding to discuss the New Mexico constitution, I want to say a word for the men who appeared in criticism of it. I am willing to make due allowance for the play of politics. It is natural that the political party framing the constitution of New Mexico should have sought to secure its control for as long a time as possible of the politics of that State, and they certainly did their work well. It is but natural, too, that they should seek whatever political advantage is to be derived from the fact that representatives of the opposite party appeared before the committee and criticized a constitution which was adopted by a majority of 18,000, and which carried the strongest Democratic counties in the Territory by large majorities.

But I want to say for these men that they stood first for statehood, to which everything else was to be subordinated, and that they did not ask at the hands of the committee any action which would endanger or delay statehood. These men labored under a great and obvious disadvantage, the disadvantage of being made to appear in the light of obstructing statehood, when all that they asked was an opportunity that the people of New Mexico might be empowered to strike off the shackles which this constitution surely and certainly fastens upon them. It was an easy matter for the proponents of this constitution to fill the people of New Mexico with alarm as to what these Democratic Representatives were doing here and to make the people of New Mexico feel that any action that might be taken by Congress would jeopardize statehood. It was charged against these Democrats that they did not represent their party or their party sentiment in New Mexico; but mark you, after Congress has said its final word in this matter, it will be claimed, and claimed from the same sources, that these men did represent the Democratic Party, which they did, one of them being the Democratic national committeeman for the Territory and another having been for years the Democratic Delegate in the Congress of the United States. But I make allowance for that. It is part of the game as it is played. I do not even criticize the men who seek political advantage in this way.

NEW MEXICO FIGHTING GROUND.

New Mexico is fighting ground. It is naturally Democratic. Under a constitution like that of Arizona it would be Democratic within five years. Relieved of the incubus of the national administration, freed from the grip of the machine boss and the corporation lawyer, given a secret ballot such as now prevails in every other State in the Union, and within five years New Mexico would sweep out of power the combination of corporate interests and political machines which took advantage of the universal and insistent demand for statehood to fasten this yoke for decades to come upon the people of a great, progressive Commonwealth such as New Mexico certainly will be. I would be somewhat concerned that New Mexico should be Democratic in politics, but I am vastly more concerned that it shall be Democratic in principle and character. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And I speak with knowledge of conditions when I say that this constitution was devised for the express purpose of defeating for many years the very cardinal principle of a republican form of government, the rule of the majority, and, under the conditions existing in New Mexico, of a great deal more than a majority. But let us examine this constitution, and let us examine it in the light, not of constitutions that were created 100 years ago, but of constitutions that are being re-created to-day throughout this broad land to conform with the progressive political spirit of the times, and see whether it meets the test, not a radical test, not the test of Arizona, of Oklahoma, of California, of Wisconsin, of Washington, of Oregon, of Colorado, of Missouri, or even of Illinois.

NEW MEXICO CONSTITUTION—THE ARTICLE ON AMENDMENTS.

The main proposition considered by the Committee on Territories was article 19 of the constitution of New Mexico, entitled "Amendments." This article starts out with the proposition that any amendment to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature at any regular session thereof, and if two-thirds of all the members elected to each house, voting separately, vote in favor thereof it may be submitted to the people, and that every eight years a majority of the legislature may submit a constitutional amendment. I would have no particular quarrel with that feature of the New Mexico constitution. There are a great many States whose legislatures permit amendment by majority and a great many permit amendment by two-thirds vote; but in that regard I am glad to subordinate my views to the views of a majority of the committee, because, after all, the recommendation of the majority of the committee is the cardinal rule of republican institutions; that is, the rule of the majority. But it is in the method of ratification of a constitutional amendment that this article was deemed by a majoriy of the committee to be indefensibly objectionable. Indeed, I undertake to say that the provision to which I am about to call attention is duplicated in no other State constitution in the Union, and it is there for a purpose.

This constitution provides that when an amendment has been submitted by the legislature it may be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon and by an affirmative vote of at least 40 per cent of all the votes cast at said election in the State and in at least one-half of the counties thereof.

The language is "in at least one-half of the counties thereof"; not 40 per cent, mind you, of the votes cast on the amendment, but 40 per cent of the total votes cast in the election for any purpose must be cast for this amendment in the State and in at least one-half of the counties of the State.

THE PROPOSED SUBSTITUTE FOR THE ARTICLE ON AMENDMENTS.

Now, I want briefly to call attention to the provisions of the proposed article on amendments. I will say, first, the committee and subcommittee gave careful attention to the provisions of the resolution. We were anxious to avoid ambiguities and complications and gave more than ordinarily close scrutiny to the effect of the various provisions and the language employed. We followed as closely as practicable the language of the enabling act and of the New Mexico constitution, and if in any particulars errors are found, the mistakes are honest and are not due to any intent to hamper, harass, mislead, or dictate to the people of the Territory.

The principal change proposed in the New Mexico constitution by the recommendation of the majority, in a nutshell, is that the majority of the legislature may propose an amendment and the majority of the votes cast thereon at the election may ratify such amendment.

This constitution contains a most extraordinary feature as it now stands, and that is that every eight years a majority of the legislature may propose an amendment. I take that as an admission that at intervals it is desirable that the majority may submit an amendment, and it leaves little substantial ground for objection to giving such powers to every legislature. It is true, as I have stated, that many States require two-thirds, but the extremely conservative constitution makers of New Mexico, having recognized the periodical desirability of power in majorities, are practically out of court on that point.

This is hardly the rock upon which we will split. If we are to submit any amendment at all to the people of New Mexico, we may as well come at once to the more modern and republican proposition of majority rule and let them say whether they will have the one or the other. Personally, I consider this provision as it now stands the least objectionable of the various features of article 19 and would not have advocated any change, notwithstanding I prefer the majority rule; but the substitute framed by your committee is not so nearly the product of one mind as is the original provision, and I am glad to support that feature as proposed, which finds sanction in the constitutions of 17 States of the Union.

METHOD OF RATIFICATION.

The next provision, however, that a majority of those voting upon an amendment shall control, is so manifestly right and so generally supported by the constitutions of the various States that I have little patience with pretended objections to it. I have made a notation here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have been interrupted so frequently that I may need 20 or 30 minutes to conclude.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for 20 minutes more.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. A table prepared by the committee shows that 28 States permit amendment by a majority of those voting thereon, and in only 18 is a greater than a majority vote required.

To count every vote cast at an election but which is not cast upon the question as a vote against it is to place a premium upon ignorance and neglect of duty, and is to place the power of defeating a measure in the hands of those who fail or refuse to exercise that power one way or the other.

The constitution makers of New Mexico recognized the fact that not nearly all voters at an election vote upon constitutional amendments when they provided that 40 per cent of the total vote cast should be necessary to adopt an amendment. The proposal would be considered monstrous that all those not voting upon an amendment should be counted as for it, but the reverse is no less monstrous in reason and justice and may be no less fruitful of harm. We may as well have a rule here in Congress that Members not voting upon a bill shall be recorded as against it. I believe in government by those who exercise the rights of citizenship, and not by those who do not. But our resourceful friends in New Mexico did not stop at the requirement that 40 per cent of the total vote cast voting affirmatively should be necessary, but that the amendment must receive such vote in at least one-half the counties in the State. So far as I know, this is a unique method of distributing political power.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think that the provision contained in the New Mexico constitution, requiring 40 per cent of all those voting for the ratification of an amendment, renders amendment more difficult than the provisions in the constitutions of some of the other States requiring a majority of all the votes cast at an election, or, as in the State of Iowa, a majority of all voters qualified to vote for members of the general assembly? I think the State of Georgia also has a provision of that kind. Does the gentleman consider that this provision he objects to renders amendment more difficult than the provisions I have referred to?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in Iowa it took a majority of all votes cast in the election?

Mr. MONDELL. In Iowa a majority is required of those qualified to vote for members of the general assembly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is neither here nor there; that is not the most objectionable feature with reference to ratifying, but still further requirements. The gentleman understands the conditions down there as well as I do—that this amendment must get at least 40 per cent of the total vote cast and 40 per cent in at least one-half of the counties in the State.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield until I read the provision in the Iowa constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; I do not care to have that taken out of my time. If he states that it takes a majority of the total vote cast in Iowa, I will accept it.

Mr. MONDELL. A majority of the electors qualified to vote for electors of the general assembly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But there is no provision in the Iowa constitution and no provision in the constitution of any other State in the Union that I ever heard of requiring a certain percentage of the vote cast in at least one-half the counties of a State to ratify an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The Constitution of the United States has a provision under which the affirmative action of three-quarters of the States is required.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, if that is such a wise and beneficent provision of the Federal Constitution, why did not the States incorporate it in their constitutions? There seems to have been some necessary line of demarcation between the State and Federal Governments when in 28 of the 46 States of the Union a constitutional amendment may be ratified by a majority of the votes cast thereon. I am arguing as to what the general rule is to show the reasonableness of the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will pardon me, the gentleman must admit that there are a number of States with constitutional provisions which render amendment quite as difficult as the provision which he criticizes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; I will not concede that, especially under the conditions existing in this Territory, the racial conditions down there. I want to say to the gentleman that this provision was not put in this constitution to restrain the Spanish-speaking people of New Mexico. It was conceded on all sides before the committee that they are a very conservative people, not much taken with changes, and that they could be depended upon to stand by the constitution as adopted. But this was put in to hog tie the American element of the Territory of New Mexico. It was readily foreseen how there could be conditions injected and issues raised of a local character that I do not care to go into at this time that would make it exceedingly difficult to ever get 40 per cent of the total vote cast for any purpose for an amendment in some of these counties.

Mr. MONDELL. I note that the amendment which is proposed in the resolution which the gentleman favors provides that no amendment by a majority vote, such as is provided, shall apply to or affect sections 1 and 3 of article 7, but as to these articles there must be a three-quarters vote of the legislators and an affirmative vote of at least three-quarters of the electors. I notice that article 1, section 1, relates to suffrage, and starts out with the declaration that every male citizen of the United States shall have a right of franchise. The gentleman comes from a woman-suffrage State, and I wonder why the gentleman considers it important that a larger vote shall be required to grant the right of suffrage to women than would be necessary for an amendment, for instance, striking out the bill of rights.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, I will say to the gentleman that I will reach that proposition in a few minutes. I will only say now that he has completely distorted the purpose of the committee, and for that matter the purpose of everybody concerned, with reference to the particular provision he has just quoted.

Mr. MONDELL. It is true that while you provide other portions of the constitution may be amended by a majority vote, a proposition to grant the franchise to women can only be adopted by a three-quarters vote of the electors. I assume that the gentleman from Colorado deems that it is wise to have that in the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. A proposition to amend sections 1 and 3 of article 7, on election franchise, and sections 8 and 12 of article 10, on education, can not be ratified except by a two-thirds vote in every county of the Territory of New Mexico, which shall be not less than three-fourths of the entire vote cast in the State, and I will explain the reason for that in a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. Just one question. I ask the gentleman from Colorado whether he considers it important that a larger vote should be required for a woman's-suffrage amendment than for an amendment, say, striking out the bill of rights.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not insert these provisions in the constitution of New Mexico, and the committee has not inserted them. The Committee on the Territories has not inserted one single word quoted by the gentleman, but we have simply left these provisions in the constitution of New Mexico as the people adopted them, because everybody who appeared before that committee, Democrats, Republicans, and insurgents, unqualifiedly stated that the people of New Mexico all wanted those provisions in the constitution as nearly unamendable as they could be made. They made them practically unamendable, and we left them that way. That is all there is to that. We are not making a constitution for the people of New Mexico.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume that the gentleman approves the provision, because the committee could have changed the provision and did not.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; the committee could have made New Mexico a constitution that would suit me in a great many particulars better than this one does, and I am pointing out some of the ways in which I could be better suited; but we are not making a constitution.

I want to say that so far as I know, and so far as has come to the attention of the committee, this 40 per cent proposition in at least one-half of the counties is absolutely a unique distribution of political power. It was claimed that the principal object of this provision was to prevent the disturbance of the different water systems existing in the American and Mexican counties, so that the one might not displace the other, or, more specifically, that the Americans might not in time seek to constitutionally overthrow the Mexican or Spanish systems.

Passing over the suggestion that anything was left undone by the framers of the New Mexico constitution to secure the Mexican support of the constitution, which suggestion is incredible in the light of provisions to which I will call attention again—the matter just mentioned by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]—I know of my own knowledge and experience that this limitation was inserted for the express purpose of rendering all parts of this constitution more difficult of amendment, and I will predict now that the very amendment proposed by this committee will be overwhelmingly defeated in certain counties of New Mexico if so willed by the controlling corporate and political influences in that Territory, and future amendments will meet the same fate; and I know this because I have got some such territory in my own district. I remember once in that State we submitted an eight-hour constitutional amendment, and down in the corporation-owned coal-mine counties that amendment was absolutely snowed under by the very men whom it was designed to benefit, simply because they were not voting, as American citizens, their own individual wills and judgments, but were voting as they were being dictated to and coerced by their employers. And we have counties, such counties as you gentlemen have in New Mexico, in which it is absolutely impossible to secure a majority for any constitutional amendment, no matter how beneficial and necessary that amendment may be, if it is opposed by the leading corporate and political influences in those counties.

I am not deceived at all as to the purpose of this extraordinary requirement, and I place too high an esteem upon the intelligence of the majority of the people in New Mexico to think they are deceived by it, and I believe, if they can get a fair expression at the polls, they will accept the substitute offered them in this resolution.

ONLY THREE "AMENDMENTS" PERMITTED.

The next change proposed by the majority is that while in the article as it now stands the number of amendments that may be submitted at one election is limited to three amendments—and I want you to note the word "amendments"—there is no limit in the substitute. I unhesitatingly criticize the present limitation as vicious and deceiving. It does not permit amendments to three articles even, but three amendments to one article would exhaust the law, and three amendments to one article, mind you, might be insufficient to properly amend the article.

Every detail proposed to be changed might be considered to be an amendment, and there would always be a question about it. We may amend six articles in Colorado, and yet we had a great legal battle there as to whether a new article did not amend several articles. I simply put this provision of the New Mexico constitution down as a joker, and as jokers have no place in a constitution we have omitted it altogether. Our action is in harmony with the general rule of other State constitutions. The gentleman from Wyoming has been springing the Federal Constitution on me, and I want to spring the Federal Constitution on him at this juncture and call his attention to the fact that at one time 10 amendments to the Federal Constitution were submitted and adopted at one time. There is no limitation as to the number of amendments that may be submitted to the Federal Constitution. We could submit 40 if we could get the votes for them here in Congress, and yet there is a purpose to limit the people of New Mexico to three amendments.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman informed as to how many constitutions of the various States the same provision applies, limiting the number of amendments which may be submitted at the same time?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. There has been some investigation made along that line, and I believe that Colorado is the only State in the Union——

Mr. MANN. Oh, well; the gentleman is mistaken about that. My own State only allows one amendment at a time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman we had several tabulations here, and I thought we had that one on that, but we have not. All I can say to the gentleman is: There was an examination or running over of the charters and constitutions, and a great majority of States do not limit the number of amendments which may be submitted to the constitution at one time; 39 of the 46 States have no such limit.

I am interested, however, in the observation of the gentleman from Illinois. Does your constitution read that not more than one amendment shall be submitted at one time or that not more than one article shall be amended at one time? Does the gentleman know which way it reads?

Mr. MANN. I think it is not more than one amendment, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Colorado constitution adopted the Illinois constitution, which contained a provision in regard to one article, but we amended it a few years ago making it six articles which might be amended hereafter.

Mr. MANN. We have not amended ours yet.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; you have not been so progressive.

Mr. MANN. But we have been far more prosperous.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think you have in proportion.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. At any rate, you are both in the Union and these Territories are not. I think my criticism is well taken that this will be a very burdensome provision of the New Mexico constitution. It will leave it an open question as to what is an amendment; and I can see no necessity for leaving any such limitation. There is no likelihood this constitution will be amended or any constitution will be amended in wholsale manner.

EDUCATION AND ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Now, I want to call attention here at this point to the proviso which was mentioned by the gentleman from Wyoming, and which is the concluding part of section 1 of article 19 of the New Mexico constitution. It reads as follows:

Provided, That no amendment shall apply to or affect the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of article 7 hereof on elective franchise, and sections 8 and 10 of article 12 hereof on education, unless it be proposed by vote of three-fourths of the members elected to each house.

Now, when you turn back to article 7 on elective franchise, you find this provision:

SEC. 3. The right of any citizen of the State to vote, hold office, or sit upon juries shall never be restricted, abridged, or impaired on account of religion, race, language, or color, or inability to speak, read, or write the English or Spanish languages, except as may be otherwise provided in this constitution; and the provisions of this section and of section 1 of this article shall never be amended except upon a vote of the people of this State in an election at which at least three-fourths of the electors voting in the whole State, and at least two-thirds of those voting in each county of the State, shall vote for such amendment.

Then you find, over in article 12 on education, the following in sections 8 and 10, providing substantially that the legislature shall provide for the training, and so forth, of teachers in the normal schools, so that they may become proficient in the English and Spanish languages, and that children of Spanish descent in the State of New Mexico shall never be denied the right of attendance and admission in the public schools and other educational institutions on an equal footing, and so forth, with all other children. That is followed by a provision that this section shall never be amended except by a vote of the people of the State in an election at which at least three-fourths voting in the State, and two-thirds voting in each county in the State, shall vote for such amendment.

Now, in the substitute article which we are proposing to submit to the people of New Mexico we let stand the proviso identically as it now appears in the constitution. It was suggested, however, that the adoption of the proposed substitute would wipe out the safeguards of articles 7 and 12, because it would be adopted subsequently to the constitution itself in point of time and so would raise a conflict. We therefore simply incorporated the ratification provisions of those sections in the proposed substitute and made it a part of the proviso in section 1 of article 19, safeguarding these things beyond question.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. In other words, we simply went forward to section 3 of article 7 and section 10 of article 12, and bodily took out the provisions about the ratification of amendments to these sections and brought them back and inserted them in the proviso.

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in section 8 of article 12 there is no provision with regard to ratification different from any other sections of the constitution, but with the resolution proposed by the committee it makes section 8 ratified only by a three-fourths and two-thirds vote, whereas, except for this resolution, it would be ratified by a majority vote. I would like to have an explanation or reason for that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has just called my attention to a conflict in these provisions which has heretofore escaped my attention. It is provided in section 3 of article 7 that that section shall never be amended "except in the following manner," and it is provided in section 10 of article 12 that that section shall never be amended "except in the following manner," both requiring a two-thirds vote in the county and three-fourths in the State. But the proviso in section 1 of article 19 reads that sections 1 and 3 of article 7 and sections 8 and 10 of article 12 shall never be amended except the amendment be proposed by at least a three-fourths vote of each House. It would look as if there is a conflict there. But yet there may be no conflict. It may be that they propose that section 1 of article 7 and section 8 of article 12 may be amended in the manner provided in article 19, but that section 3 of article 7 and section 10 of article 12 shall never be amended except in the manner provided for in the sections.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman if this resolution, then, does not make it much more difficult to amend section 8 of article 12 than does the original constitution? I would like to ask the gentleman whether the resolution now before the committee does not make it much more difficult to amend section 8 of article 12 than the original constitution does?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The language of the resolution undoubtedly renders all of these sections unamendable except in the manner pointed out in the proviso—that is, three-fourths of the vote of the entire State and two-thirds in each county. But even as to section 1 of article 7 and section 8 of article 12, you could never get a three-fourths vote of both Houses to propose an amendment, so the sections are practically unamendable, anyhow.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not see any conflict there at all. The original provision of article 3 in section 7, for instance, required that an amendment should be ratified by three-quarters of the votes and also by two-thirds in the counties. Article 19, in reference to amendments, provides that an amendment shall not be submitted unless three-quarters of the legislators vote to submit it. Now, in your proposition—which I do not agree to—you simply carry these two propositions combined in the proviso. You have not changed that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. We have not. We have brought the provisions back and inserted them in the proviso because it was suggested that the subsequent adoption of the article would create a conflict between the method of ratification in section 1, article 19, and the special method provided in the articles on education and franchise.

Mr. MANN. But does the gentleman think you can provide in a constitution that a certain section shall not be amended except in a certain way, and make it so inviolable that by the adoption of another amendment to the constitution you can not amend it in any way that you please? Does the gentleman believe that a constitution can be so constructed that it can not be changed by subsequent amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. We did not concern ourselves with that question. They had evidently sought to tie up the proposition beyond amendment except through the medium of a constitutional convention, which is also tied up, and we were willing to allow them to do so.

Mr. MANN. That is not an issue here. I was only asking if the gentleman had an opinion about it. Suppose you should provide by amendment to the constitution authorizing it to be amended in any particular by a majority vote. Does not that supersede everything else in the constitution? You had in Colorado a provision that only one article could be submitted, and thereupon you amended that and made it six.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The constitution can only be amended in the manner prescribed by the constitution unless a constitutional convention is held. Of course the convention could do as it pleases, but the legislature could not submit an amendment for the people to vote upon in contravention of the constitution.

Mr. MANN. They could submit an amendment to be voted upon providing for a different method of amending the constitution, and if that was adopted you would make it wide open.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The method we submit is not wide open.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman state the majority for this constitution in New Mexico and also in Arizona, and the number of votes cast in each Territory?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have not those figures, but the New Mexico constitution was adopted by 18,000 majority and the Arizona constitution got 77 per cent of the total vote cast. I think the chairman will supply those figures a little later; but, anyway, there was an overwhelming majority for both.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

TEXAS-NEW MEXICO BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to inquire of him in relation to section 2 of the joint resolution.

What I want to suggest to the gentleman is this: The gentleman is undoubtedly familiar with the fact that when the people of New Mexico ratified their constitution they ratified a constitution which did not give the true boundary line of New Mexico, and that on February 16, 1911, we passed a joint resolution defining the true boundaries of New Mexico.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Exactly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And when we put through the joint resolution approving the constitution of New Mexico in February last we declared that we approved of the constitution of New Mexico subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution of February 16. Now, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Colorado, as a member of the Committee on the Territories, that inasmuch as you are requiring the people of New Mexico to pass upon parts of the constitution, whether it would not be a good idea to require them to vote upon a proposition that their true boundaries shall be the boundaries not as defined in their constitution, but the boundaries as defined by the joint resolution of February 16? You might just as well do that as to make this declaration, and there is a question I take it whether we absolutely make those boundaries beyond all question the boundaries of the proposed State of New Mexico by this method.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. As I understand, if I may be permitted——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly I will yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan, as far as I am concerned I am very glad to hear his suggestion. Our idea was, and we thought we were correct in that, that there was a survey a number of years ago known as the Clark survey——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That fixed the boundary line between New Mexico and Texas, and that survey had been ratified and affirmed both by Congress and by the Legislature of Texas, but was ignored by the constitutional convention of New Mexico. We thought that the joint resolution of February 16, 1911, reaffirming the Clark survey as the true boundary line between those two States and incorporating the provisions with reference to the joint resolution of 1911 in this resolution, would fix that matter beyond all question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest this: There is always this question, a constitution having been framed and having been ratified by the people of a Territory proposing to become a State, whether a change of the constitution itself in any particular does not require the same ratification that the constitution as a whole received, in order to validate it, as the constitution of the proposed State. Now, in this you do not require that vote. Therefore, it occurred to me, since you are proposing these votes, that it would be very simple to make it dead sure that the people ratified a constitution with the true boundary lines in it. You have not the true boundary lines in the constitution of New Mexico. You provide here, in effect, that they are admitted with boundaries subject to the joint resolution of February 16, and I am inclined to think that if there should be litigation about it the courts would probably hold that they were admitted with that condition as a fundamental condition, and yet, inasmuch as you are going to require these people to vote, I suggest whether it might not be a good idea before this joint resolution goes out of the House to put that in it as a question to be voted upon as a part of their constitution.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman, that it does not impress me that it is necessary at all, but the committee will be together sometime during this discussion, and they will take up this suggestion and consider it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was the author of the resolution with reference to the boundary between Texas and New Mexico. This was brought about at the request of the Attorney General of the United States, who assisted me in drafting the resolution, with the President and the Senator representing the State of Texas, and it was there——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That was the resolution of February 16?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; and it was understood thoroughly that it could not in any way affect the boundary between New Mexico and Texas, but it would be a fixed boundary hereafter.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Suppose we should adopt the joint resolution approving the constitution of New Mexico, with boundaries other than those specified in the joint resolution of February 16, that resolution being adopted subsequent to the joint resolution of February 16, might not some lawyer claim hereafter that we had waived the joint resolution of February 16 and approved the boundaries other than those contained in the resolution of February 16?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But we specify here that this admission is subject to the resolution of February 16, 1911.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Precisely; but by so doing you do not change the constitution, the people themselves have never ratified the constitution in that——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But we have jurisdiction now of the boundary line of the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I beg pardon——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The question is between the Congress of the United States and the Legislature of Texas. They have confirmed——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think the gentleman misunderstood me. The constitution specifies boundaries different from the boundaries as specified in the joint resolution of February 16.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I understand that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And that is part of the constitution.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But we have fixed the boundary line in the resolution of February 16, 1911, and this resolution admitting this State as a State of the Union refers to this resolution of February 16, 1911, and says that the true boundary line——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But the people of New Mexico have never ratified that. You make no provision for the ratification of it. I simply suggest you might easily make a provision for the ratification, so as to tie it up beyond peradventure.

A FEW WORDS TO THE MEXICAN PEOPLE.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this particular topic is sufficiently misunderstood by the various gentlemen who have participated in the discussion, I want to proceed; and before I dispose of this proviso, in which we have sought to safeguard the Mexican people against future discrimination, I want to say a few words to our Mexican friends down in New Mexico. I represent counties of you in my district. The greater part of my district was carved out of your Territory. I know you. You will be told that this substitute is a dark and carefully veiled attack on your rights, but nothing is farther from the truth. You have rights. Yours is the right of prior occupancy and possession. The provisions on education and the elective franchise in the New Mexico constitution safeguard you against discrimination or deprivation of any right because of race, color, religion, language, or inability to speak, read, or write the English language. Your children shall always have access to the schools of New Mexico on equal footing with all other children, and teachers will be trained in both languages. In the substitute we offer you are more fully protected, if possible, because the constitution as it now stands says that no amendment shall apply to these special provisions unless proposed by a three-fourths vote of each house, and we immediately say that it must be ratified by not less than two-thirds of the total vote in each county and by not less than three-fourths of the total vote in the State, thereby removing all possibility of a conflict between article 19 and the articles on the elective franchise and education. In addition, we propose to strike from the enabling act the disability to hold office imposed upon your native tongue.

I want to warn you, therefore, against specious pleas intended to frighten you into opposing the constitutional amendment upon which you are to vote if this resolution passes. And I want to point out to you the fact that in Colorado your people have been treated fairly and their rights protected without the extraordinary safeguards in the New Mexico constitution. You are not to be cajoled into the belief that the corporation lawyers and political bosses who framed the New Mexico constitution are your divinely appointed guardians. They would double-cross you quicker than anybody if it served their selfish interests, and they have no interest in you further than they can use you to serve their own purposes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I hope, therefore, to see you, my Mexican friends, strike hands with the progressive American element in New Mexico to make that a State where some decent measure of fairness will be realized in the election of officers and the making and administration of law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to give a little attention at this point to the minority reports which have been filed upon this resolution.

THE MINORITY REPORTS.

The majority report is consistent. It recommends the submission to a separate vote of the people of each Territory that feature of each constitution which is considered so objectionable as to make it a material issue. The minority have filed two reports. That by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDEMEYER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. YOUNG] is consistent. It recommends the admission of both Territories as States under the constitutions as heretofore adopted. But the views of the majority of the minority contain about as many inconsistencies as could well be crowded into three pages of print.

In the first place they say:

As to Arizona, we agree with the majority of the Committee on the Territories that there should be submitted to the qualified voters of Arizona the question whether the provision in their proposed constitution providing for a recall of public officers shall apply to judicial officers.

And in the next place they say:

That the admission of Arizona as a State in the Union under its constitution shall be dependent upon the ratification of the proposition or amendment providing that the recall of public officers, as now proposed in the Arizona constitution heretofore adopted, shall not be construed to apply to judicial officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I did not get a chance to use very much of that 15 minutes myself, I was interrupted so frequently.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will yield 20 minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for 20 minutes more.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. They, therefore, say in one breath that they agree with the majority in submitting the proposed exemption of the judiciary to a vote of the people, letting them vote it in or out; and in the next breath that they must vote it in as a condition precedent to statehood.

But that is not the only inconsistency. It is absurd to submit to a vote of the people a proposition which they must adopt. If they must adopt the proposition, let Congress impose it. I would much rather see the committee amendment as to New Mexico go into the New Mexico constitution than to see the recall of the judiciary come out of the constitution of Arizona, but it has seemed to me all along that if the adoption of these provisions was to be made mandatory, then it was the logical thing for Congress, which has the power, to impose them. Such an election would be farcical, and it strikes me as the taking of a position by the minority which is hard to defend upon any ground. I do not envy the task of those gentlemen who have to defend such a proposition.

If the people of Arizona were required to go through this senseless formality in order to gain admission to the Union, I would not blame them for voting the exemption into the constitution at the first election and then voting it out at the next.

Our minority friends also say that they object to the delay in the admission of New Mexico as a State, which will be caused by requiring a new election to be held as proposed by the majority, and then say, with reference to the recall of the judiciary in Arizona that this question can be submitted to the voters of Arizona at the same time with the election of State and other officers at an election to be called in conformity with the provisions in the enabling act, in order to save the delay and expense of two elections in Arizona, which is precisely what the majority propose in the case of the New Mexico amendment.

There will be no two elections in either case. The election upon these amendments will be held at the same time and place as the election for State officers. They will have the same election officers. There will be absolutely no delay and very little additional expense entailed by the fact that they are required to vote on this constitutional amendment at the same time that they are required to vote for their State officers.

EXEMPTING JUDICIARY ONLY.

But it would be most interesting to know by what line of constitutional reasoning the majority of the minority arrived at the conclusion that a constitution providing for the recall of all executive and legislative officers is republican in form, while the recall of judicial officers, to quote their own language, is "fundamentally destructive of republican form of government."

I lay no claims to being a constitutional lawyer, but it is my understanding that the fundamental fact in the structure of our Government is that the three departments are coordinate and of equal power and dignity within their respective spheres, and, so far as I am concerned, I would see the entire institution of the recall fall to the ground before I would ever give my consent to the proposition recognized by the report of the minority that one of these departments is so superior in character, function, and dignity that it is to be exempt by the fundamental law of the land from provisions by which the people undertake to control the tenure of office of the other two departments, or in any other material respect. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not take the position that the merits of the recall is not a debatable question. All reforms are debatable. I believe with ex-President Roosevelt that the experiment ought to be permitted to the people of a State who express a desire to undertake it, and I hope that its results will be beneficial and the institution permanent.

WHAT IS A REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Article IV, section 4, of the Federal Constitution provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." In the course of the gentleman's investigation, has he run across a definition of what constitutes a republican form of government—one that satisfies him—in contradistinction to a democracy?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe there was a satisfactory definition of a republican form of government given before the committee——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would not want to accept that as authority.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It was made, not on the authority of the gentleman who made the statement, but he took it from Madison. "A republican form of government is one whose officers serve during good behavior for a fixed period or at the will of the people."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. So far as Madison's definition goes, a republican form of government is a representative form of government, is it not?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should not say it necessarily means representative.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman did not quote the whole of the definition. He speaks of officers in a republican form of government, and those under the definition of Madison were elective officers.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say this, that I believe the initiative and referendum, which is in the Arizona constitution—and it is not proposed to keep that Territory out on account of that provision—is much nearer to the question of representative government the gentleman is driving at than that of the recall, because the recall is only another method of removing an officer. We have the method of impeachment at the hands of the legislature, and the recall is only an impeachment by the people.

The initiative and referendum goes directly to the question of representative government, and I think we had the initiative and referendum form of government existing locally at the time the Constitution was adopted, and that that form is permissible under the Constitution of this country.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to say that I did not rise for the purpose of undertaking to discuss the merits or demerits of the initiative and referendum, but I wanted to get the gentleman's definition of what constitutes a republican form of government as contradistinguished from a democracy.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Several States in the West, I will say, have a republican form of government and are operating under the so-called "nostrum."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would the gentleman be kind enough to give me his definition of what constitutes a republican form of government?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I can give the gentleman a concrete illustration. I think the people of Arizona have adopted a republican form of government in their constitution.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, that is begging the question. I suppose the gentleman concedes the high authority of the fathers of the Republic, and I supposed that the gentleman, when he was discussing this profoundly important question, might be able to lay his hand upon some definition of a republican form of government.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe that government by consent of the governed is a republican form of government.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, but a pure democracy is that.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If the gentleman from Michigan would like to have Madison's definition, I have got it here.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to have the gentleman read it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will extend my time, I would be glad to yield to the chairman, who has been so kind to me. I want to say, however, that I will never yield to the proposition that the word "republican," as used in the Constitution of the United States, has any such restricted meaning as the gentleman contends for, and if it has, every form of democracy in this country would be unconstitutional.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it not fair reasoning that when the framers of the Constitution adopted that language—that the United States should guarantee to every State a republican form of government—they meant that the United States would guarantee the form of representative government which already existed in the thirteen States?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No, sir; it meant to guarantee them a free form of government, in which the people were supreme.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is not that the construction put upon it by the commentators on the Constitution from the beginning down to now? I do not accept the Arizona constitution or the opinion of some gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Territories. I am asking the gentleman to give us what lawyers concede to be authority, not somebody's speculation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The delegate in the Constitutional Convention who was the author of that section of the Constitution which guaranteed to each State a republican form of government afterwards became a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and he gave a definition of what, in his opinion, was a republican form of government, and I will read that to the gentleman from Michigan if he would like to hear it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Who was that?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. James Wilson, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I hope the gentleman will read the whole of it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will read a part of it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want the gentleman to read that part which shows that it is a representative form of government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will read the gentleman exactly what he says. Speaking of the State of Georgia, he said:

> As a citizen, I know the government of that State to be republican, and my short definition of such a government is one constructed on this principle, that the supreme power resides in the body of the people.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think that definition ought to satisfy the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] until such time as he gets the floor in his own right. [Laughter.]

GROUNDS FOR RECALL OF JUDGES.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LITTLETON. I would like to have the gentleman from Colorado indicate, if he will, upon what grounds, or what character of grounds, he thinks a recall of a judge should take place.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, I think it may properly take place on the same grounds for which he could be impeached by a legislative body. Sometimes some of them are sought to be impeached and the proceeding is a failure when it ought to succeed. Perhaps if the people had the impeaching of some judges, the procedure would not result so invariably in a whitewash, as congressional impeachments have resulted.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield until I may answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I think a ground for a recall of a judge, where there have been proper safeguards thrown around it, would be such grounds as were exposed repeatedly in the case of New York City Judges Barnard and Cordoza, who often and corruptly made orders in favor of the Tweed ring and were impeached and removed from office, but not impeached until long after their corruption had become known to the general public and had disgusted the people of the city of New York, and, indeed, of the whole of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend that this discussion should go off into New York politics. [Laughter.] We are away off now in the wild and woolly and untrammeled West.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LITTLETON. May I ask the gentleman from Colorado—and by that angle may I reach the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]—if he charges that the trial of Cordoza and Barnard, however corrupt they may have been and however much they may have prostituted the public service, should have been had without charges and without a hearing? [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. COOPER. I do not, I say to the gentleman from New York; and I will say further that his question involves the well-known fallacy of a begging of the whole question. The American people, reading as they do, considering and understanding public questions as they do, are not going to be stampeded into the removal of a judge without charges and without the charges being established. But I have not committed myself to the granting of the right of recall as to the judiciary. I was simply seeking to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON] to the gentleman from Colorado. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado one question, or, rather, to answer one other question which has been propounded to him as to a republican form of government.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Abraham Lincoln, one of the most profound lawyers the country ever knew, one of the highest-minded patriots, gave a definition, I think, of what this Government is, which is a definition of a republican form of government—a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Did he say that was a republican form of government?

Mr. COOPER. No; but he said this was a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, those phrases have been rolled off from the lips of gentlemen on Fourth of July orations ever since Lincoln uttered them. I was asking someone as a lawyer to give a distinction between a republican form of government and a democracy, and the gentleman from Wisconsin simply quotes those words, which are beautiful and true, but they do not give the distinction, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin has stated his case fully and eloquently——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Eloquently; yes.

RECALL SHOULD APPLY TO ALL OR NONE.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And I want him to let it rest at that. I say I am not taking the position that the recall of the judiciary, for example, or of any other officer, is not a debatable question, but I do take the position that the unwisdom of subjecting all of the officers of one department of the government to this method of removal from office and exempting all the officers of another department is beyond argument, and if carried to a logical conclusion would make the judiciary what it was never intended by the fathers and what ought not to be—superior to the other departments of government. And in this connection I make note of the fact that a lesser status was given to the judiciary of the United States when it was made appointive and not elective.

The executive and legislative departments of government hold their commission from the people, but the judiciary holds its commission from the Executive, with the consent of the legislative. And of these, the legislative is incontestably the first. This Government was not created by the executives or by judges, but by legislators. The legislature, not courts or executives, is the palladium of our liberties. The executives and judges are properly the ministers and servants of the law-making power to do those things which it has ordained but which it can not execute or interpret, and it may even remove them, but can not be removed by them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Our friends, therefore, not merely seeking to meet the presidential objection to the constitution of Arizona, as we have done, but basing their objection upon a fundamental ground, should have leveled it against the entire proposition. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to hasten on. I want to refer briefly to some of the provisions——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. RAKER. Under your resolution, on page 12, commencing on line 24, after the word "constitution," in substance is that if this constitutional provision should fail of adoption by the people of Arizona the original provision in regard to the recall of the judiciary would remain in the constitution as it is now presented to Congress for its action. Is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Now, if the people of Arizona fail to thus carry this amendment as proposed——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I see what the gentleman is driving at——

Mr. RAKER. There is another stronger than that, and it is this: Is not it a fact that when the people of Arizona fail to adopt this proposed constitutional amendment it will come back to the President, and it must require his approval before Arizona can be admitted as a State?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; we do not understand that anything will come back from Arizona or New Mexico to the President for his approval or disapproval. The returns will be certified to him of the elections in Arizona and New Mexico, but we only require them to furnish evidence that the vote was had on the amendments under the resolution.

Mr. RAKER. But under your enabling act it requires the affirmative act of the President to bring it in as a State. Is not that right?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Under the enabling act it does; yes.

Mr. RAKER. How are you going to overcome that by this proposed amendment in regard to the recall when it goes back to the people?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. This resolution is going to the President. This resolution that we are considering now is going to the President, and if the President approves this resolution, which we hope and believe he will, the State is admitted when it complies with it. There will be no further approval or disapproval of it by the President. He will accept the returns certified to him by the governors of Arizona and New Mexico and issue his proclamations accordingly.

Mr. RAKER. Without his approval under the original enabling act?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The enabling act is repealed where it is in conflict with this.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. We contend that if he signs this resolution it will be an approval of those constitutions, with the condition attached to it just as it is imposed by Congress.

Mr. RAKER. Then, in other words, the gentleman claims that this amended resolution does away with the affirmative approval of the Arizona Constitution by the President?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. We claim that when he signs this resolution he will, in effect, affirm in every respect, save that which in Congress disapproves, which is tantamount, however, to an entire disapproval of the constitutions until the condition imposed is complied with.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What the gentleman says is true, but it does not quite cover the case. Is not this resolution based upon the proposition now that Congress has the power to admit any Territory as a State regardless of the provision in the enabling act with reference to the approval of a constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is.

Mr. MANN. You are not requiring the approval of the constitution at all, but you consider it as a republican form of government and admit the State?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is an entirely new proposition, admitting these States when they do the thing enjoined on them, but as framed the President must first sign it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been interrupted so much that I desire to yield such time to him as may be necessary for him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we can never get through at that rate.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will yield the gentleman such time as he may desire to finish his speech.

PRESIDENT HAS NOT DECLARED RECALL UNREPUBLICAN.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I observe on page 6 of the majority report that the controlling reason of the committee for proposing this change was the objection of the President to the recall provision of the Arizona constitution, so far as it applies to the judiciary, and the belief on the part of the committee that if the recall as applied to the judiciary was again submitted to the people of Arizona it would meet the objections of the President?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to ask if the gentleman knows—and I do not want to embarrass him if he does not—whether the President put that on the ground that it would render the constitution not republican in form, or whether he said it is on account of his own personal objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have never heard any expression attributed to the President from any source to the effect that he believed the recall of the judiciary to be unrepublican in form. He is very much opposed to it as a matter of policy, and he thinks it very unwise and very unfair to the judiciary. He thinks it will subject them to popular clamor, and all that sort of thing; but I do not understand that the President has ever stated anywhere to anybody that it is in violation of the Constitution of this country.

THE NEW MEXICO REFERENDUM.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed, if I may, without interruption. I want to refer to a few features of the constitution of New Mexico which indicate that there is some method in the apparent hog tying of that constitution in the manner in which it is hog tied in the article on amendments, and that is the only expression that occurs to my mind to fitly characterize what they have done to that constitution in that regard. New Mexico is not so backward or reactionary as some gentlemen might infer, as will be admitted when it is known that 51 of the 100 members of her constitutional convention were elected upon a pledge for the initiative and referendum. But something happened. I do not know what it was. Things frequently happen in conventions, and sometimes in more dignified bodies than conventions, where gentlemen go pledged to certain propositions, and then change their minds. They have no initiative at all in the New Mexico constitution, and this is what they have now in the way of a referendum: Ten per cent of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the counties, constituting not less than 10 per cent of the qualified electors of the State, may sign a petition to submit a legislative act to the voters at the next election, and 40 per cent of the total votes cast at such election, not upon the law, but for governor or other high officer, whatever the high vote may be—and you can rest assured it would be the high vote—are requisite to annul the act.

To suspend the act before it becomes effective—before it takes effect—requires the petition within 90 days of not less than 25 per cent of the electors in three-fourths of the counties in the State, being not less than 25 per cent of the total votes cast, and 40 per cent, as before, to annul. And annulment revives the former law.

But now listen to this provision in the New Mexico referendum:

> It shall be a felony for any person to sign any such petition with any name other than his own, or to sign his name more than once to any measure, or to sign any such petition when he is not a qualified elector in the county specified in such petition.

The intent and object of that provision is obvious. It was obviously intended to scare the voters out of signing any such petition. It strikes me that a simpler and more effective way of getting at the desired result would have been to make it a misdemeanor to sign such a petition. I would like to stay in Congress until a legislative act was suspended under the provisions of the New Mexico referendum. But that is not all. There are some exemptions in the referendum in New Mexico. First, the general appropriation laws, then laws for the preservation of public peace, health, and safety. I have no quarrel with these. But listen to this exemption:

> Laws for the payment of the public debt or interest thereon or the creation or funding of the same.

Now, if there is any one power which has been universally reserved to the electors of the States from time immemorial it is that of funding public debts or creating bond issues. To create such State debts this power is reserved to the people of the State. To create such county debts it is reserved to the people of the county.

To create such municipal debts it is reserved to the people of the municipality. I may safely say that that is the universal rule. It is true there are exceptions in the New Mexico constitution, but the State is starting out with several millions—about four millions—of Territorial, county, and railroad indebtedness, and may contract other huge indebtedness, in the funding or refunding of which the people will have no referendum.

LEGISLATIVE AND JUDICIAL GERRYMANDER.

Then take the matter of legislative apportionment. The districts are so gerrymandered that 4 of the 26 counties will control the legislature politically. I would not complain of this, but it is further provided that only after each decennial census may the legislature reapportion the State. This insures the Republican Party control of the New Mexico Legislature for the next 10 years, no matter what political changes may occur, and will probably render a reapportionment impossible even far beyond that time. The State is judicially gerrymandered and tied up in the same way.

STATE CORPORATION COMMISSION.

Article 11 creates a State corporation commission, to which is given exclusive power and jurisdiction over railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping-car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers. After defining the powers of this State corporation commission comes the following extraordinary provision:

> In case of failure or refusal of any person, company, or corporation to comply with any order within the time limit therein, unless an order of removal shall have been taken from such order by the company or corporation to the supreme court of this State, it shall immediately become the duty of the commission to remove such order, with the evidence adduced upon the hearing, with the documents in the case, to the supreme court of this State.

In other words, this constitutional provision, which is to be found in no other State constitution, acts as an automatic injunction in every case, no matter how trivial, and upon every order, no matter how well settled the principles or issues involved. This is supposed to be a certain remedy for the use of injunctions against corporation commissions, and I should think it would be. It is only necessary for the defendant to ignore the order of the commission until the time set for its execution expires, when the whole matter will be removed automatically to the supreme court. As if to render this alleged corporation commission still more ornamental in character, the supreme court may try every appealed case de novo, taking new evidence. The function of the corporation commission, therefore, is purely advisory, and the supreme court will be the real corporation commission of New Mexico. The commission can not even subpœna witnesses or punish for contempt except through the medium of the courts.

ARIZONA CONSTITUTION COMPARED.

Contrast with this provision that of the constitution of Arizona, which, in addition to giving its corporation commission full power to regulate all public-service corporations within the State, also empowers it to enforce the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence and to punish for contempt, and which further provides that the rules, regulations, orders, or decrees of the commission shall remain in force pending the decision of the courts.

Which of these constitutional provisions approximates the latest expression of Congress as prescribed in the recent amendments to the interstate-commerce law, known as the Mann bill, from which I quote as follows:

All orders of the commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than 30 days, and continue in force for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the commission, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

The pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the Commerce Court, in its discretion, may restrain or suspend in whole or in part the operation of the commission's order pending the final hearing and determination of the suit—

The Arizona constitution gives every public-service corporation the right with any of its lines to cross, intersect, or connect with the lines of any other public-service corporation; but in New Mexico permission to intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad must be secured "in each instance" from the commission.

The people of New Mexico may want to modernize their State corporation commission, or galvanize it into life, or empower the legislature to have some authority in the premises, or become dissatisfied with the supreme court as the regulative body; and I can see them now getting 40 per cent of the total vote cast for governor at an election and in at least one-half of the counties in the State for such an amendment, and I can see them all the more plainly because I have some such counties in my own State, where no opposed amendment could get a majority even of those voting upon it. It is a well-known fact that rarely is two-thirds of the total vote cast at an election cast upon an amendment, so that this provision puts the power of defeating amendments in the hands of those who are too ignorant or too careless to vote upon them at all. The chief cause of complaint, however, is the 40 per cent requirement in at least one-half of the counties in a State so divided racially as to make it more than ordinarily difficult to secure an amendment to the New Mexico constitution under any kind of method, however liberal.

OMISSIONS OF THE NEW MEXICO CONSTITUTION.

It is not only in the matter of taking things out of the New Mexico constitution that the people might want to exercise some practicable method of amendment. In the light of modern political ideals this constitution is quite as remarkable for the things that are left out. The moving principle of the Arizona constitution appears to have been faith in the people and that of the New Mexico constitution fear the people.

Some queer things develop in Congress. Representatives come here from States where every "ism" has its day. They must swallow every political nostrum and seek office as Republicans in the garb of populism. They must be for the Oregon plan. They must be against Aldrichism and Cannonism and Payneism. They must overthrow their own party organization under the shibboleth of progress, and then when they get down here to Congress they swallow such a constitutional antiquity as the New Mexican constitution at a gulp, without winking, and not only say that it tastes good, but that it is partisan politics to take the position that the people of a new State ought to be given an opportunity to say whether they want a practicable and truly republican method of amending their constitution.

NO GENERAL EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY LAWS.

Here are some of the things upon which the constitution of New Mexico is silent: Excepting railway employees, it does not contain a word with reference to employer's liability laws or enjoin in any manner the enactment of such laws upon the legislature. It is true the legislature can enact such laws, but why not have given them the sanction of the constitution? Why protect the railway employees by the most sweeping provision that language could devise and leave the men in the mines without protection? The constitution of Arizona nullifies anti-liability contracts between employer and employee; abolishes the rule of fellow servant; makes the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk questions of fact for the jury; prohibits statutory limitations on the amount of recovery; provides for a workman's compensation law and commands the legislature to enact liability laws for all forms of industry.

These are all issues vital to the wage earner, but do not seem to have been of sufficient consequence in the minds of the constitution makers of New Mexico to receive mention. Every lawyer of experience knows the difficulty of devising such legislation so as to avoid constitutional objections, and with a proper recognition of these principles in the organic law the battle is half won. So far as New Mexico is concerned, it will, with the adoption of this constitution, be not even begun.

ARIZONA LABOR ARTICLE.

Arizona has dignified labor with a labor article in its constitution, and, in view of the threatened disapproval of that constitution, I commend that article to the attention of wage earners everywhere, and I stand ready to back the bald assertion that article 19 of the constitution of Arizona, entitled "Labor," does more for the protection of the wage earners in fewer words than does any constitution ever written.

DIRECT PRIMARIES.

There is a popular political institution in this country to-day known as the direct primary, but it is unknown to the constitution of New Mexico. It will be said that the legislature may enact such a law, but it might well have received the positive sanction of a constitution which defines with such particularity the method of regulating corporations. Corporation regulation is a necessary feature of modern government, but government regulation itself is much more necessary. Given this, all these other things will be added unto the people, and without this nothing else will be regulated.

The constitution of Arizona enjoins the enactment of a direct primary election law for all officers from United States Senator to constable, together with a secret ballot and publicity of campaign expenses, both before and after elections. New Mexico is silent on all these popular measures. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ENOUGH SHOWN TO WARRANT COMMITTEE'S ACTION.

Other features of this constitution have been criticized by those conversant with the local conditions involved, but it is not my purpose to go into a general analysis of either of these constitutions. The features mentioned are typical, and I submit that sufficient has been shown to indicate that with the development and growth of population now going on and which will increase under statehood, and with the consideration of statehood eliminated, a majority of the people of New Mexico may properly want to amend their constitution in various particulars, a thing obviously impracticable, if not impossible, as it is now framed.

THE SPIRIT OF ARIZONA.

I have already contrasted the attitude of the Arizona delegation with that of New Mexico in expressing entire willingness to have any feature of their constitution resubmitted, but I want to go further and congratulate the people of Arizona upon the splendid spirit displayed by them in adopting the kind of constitution they wanted, notwithstanding the fact that the President had warned them in advance of his disapproval of such a constitution as he termed a zoological garden, by which expression he characterizes the various progressive measures for enlarging the rule and power of the people, not one of which measures has ever received his sanction.

This is not the first time in recent years that the Executive has sought to influence and coerce the people of a new State in framing the organic law under which they were to live, move, and have their being. The present Executive, when a Cabinet officer, was sent by his chief, who now appears to see things in a different light, into the then Territory of Oklahoma, which was framing a zoological garden form of constitution, and which was adopted by the people of Oklahoma by 114,000 majority, and under which constitution Oklahoma has flourished as has no other State throughout the entire history of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Life, liberty, and property are nowhere safer than in Oklahoma, and in no State have the people a larger measure of governmental power than the people of that State. And this is the history and the lesson of the growth of democracy. From the cave man to Lincoln the trend of power has been from the ruler to the ruled; and never were the blessings of life, liberty, and property so generally diffused or so secure; never were governments so stable as to-day, when the will of the people is manifest in all civilized governments as never before at any time in the history of the world. I think we may well pause a moment in admiration of the American spirit of Arizona. The presidential shadow, great as it is, both naturally and officially, did not obscure the vision or chill the spirit of the hardy, rugged manhood of Arizona. The Postmaster General, who knows more about politics than he does about post offices [applause on the Democratic side], took up a quondam residence in Arizona and secured control of a bunch of daily newspapers, forsooth, to guide with the superior light of his wisdom the benighted denizens of that Territory in framing a safe, sane, and conservative constitution and incidentally to make himself a United States Senator. But the constitution of Arizona bears no earmarks of such authorship, and the senatorial seed fell upon such sterile soil that it found no root.

New Mexico was a more fruitful field for such enterprises and listened with a readier ear to the call for a safe and sane constitution. Personally I should ask for no cleaner-cut political issue in this country than the approval by a Republican President of such an instrument as the New Mexico constitution and the disapproval by him of such an instrument as the constitution of Arizona.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman know the Democrats of Oklahoma have made two efforts already to amend the constitution—the best constitution ever written?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, the people of Arizona I hope will make a great many more than two efforts to amend their constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. The fact that the people of Oklahoma made two efforts to amend their constitution simply demonstrates their progressiveness. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it further demonstrates the fact that the initiative and referendum is not such a dangerous proposition after all. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. It is a fact that the people of Oklahoma have made two efforts to amend their constitution. They made one very earnest effort to amend the constitution in which they failed. There is, at the present time, another effort being initiated to amend the constitution in our State in which I hope they will fail. For instance, every time the Oklahoma Legislature has met it has made the election laws of that State more partisan. At the last election, or rather prior to the last election, the legislature had increased the partisanship of the Oklahoma election laws——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. And it was submitted to the people, and every liberal honest Democrat voted with the Socialists and Republicans in overwhelmingly defeating it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The only objection I have to the statement of the gentleman is that it is one of the things that calls for a reply and is a seesaw back and forth. Brother CARTER has a reply on his lips, I think.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know to whom the gentleman from Oklahoma refers when he speaks of liberal Democrats joining with the Republicans——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I did not mean the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I did not mean the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. I did not understand what the gentleman said.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have nearly concluded, and I decline to yield.

Mr. CARTER. Just a moment. I do not know who the gentleman means by the "good, liberal Democrats." I have never heard of any charge of fusion in Oklahoma except that between Republicans and Socialists. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I must refuse to yield.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I just want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have just about concluded, Mr. Chairman. But I will say, before concluding, that I have not sought to inject my personal opinions or prejudices at all into the discussion of this resolution. No matter what criticisms I have passed upon the constitution of New Mexico, and no matter what partisan observations I have made in the course of my remarks, I have voted in the committee to submit to the people of Arizona a proviso excepting the judiciary from the operation of the recall when, as I have already stated, I do not believe in distinguishing between the judicial and other departments of this Government. I do not believe the judiciary is a superior or more sacred department of this Government. The Government of England has weathered the storms of the centuries with the judiciary decidedly inferior in power and importance to the legislative branch, with the executive decidedly inferior to the legislative branch. Not in 200 years has a ruler of England vetoed an act of Parliament, and the British Parliament is today gestating a law, as it has many other laws, providing in express terms that no court shall question the constitutionality or validity of such law.

President Taft has been over in New York City inveighing bitterly against the recall, its alleged tendency to discredit judges, and all that sort of thing. He thinks that in the matter of procedure and the trial of causes the English courts are somewhat better situated than the American courts. But I would like to invite his attention to the larger aspects of the case, such as those I have just stated. The fact of the matter is that the tendency in this country has been not to degrade but to exalt the judiciary, permitting it to nullify the most solemn legislative enactments which have grown out of the very distress of the people and to legislate.

I am one of those who think it would be better to have a just judge unjustly recalled than to have a just law which affects all the people unjustly wiped off the statute books. I see no occasion for hysteria over the recall of judges. I am not an institution worshiper. I regard all public officials as public servants, with no more right to betray their employers and retain their places than a private servant, and I can anticipate no harm to the structure and integrity of the judiciary if the people are empowered to do by the recall what the legislative body may now do by impeachment, and remove them from office.

All this talk about the mob, mob law, and mob rule is an insult to the patriotism and an impeachment of the capacity for citizenship of the people of this country. Some people are always harping on mob rule in connection with these progressive reforms that are gaining such force all over this country at this time. Where are all these mobs and what are these mobs? What are they but the great body of American citizenship? There is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that the government of any State in the Union could be reorganized and every office in that State vacated and refilled, and still that State would have a stable government. There are scores of men in each Member's district who are just as well qualified, and perhaps better, to come here and make laws for the country as the Members themselves.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would take a whole day to reorganize a State?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, it might take a whole day back East, but out West it would not. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We are west in Michigan.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Oh, you think you are West, but we call you East. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You have a good many misnomers out in your country. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I know that a whole lot is claimed for these reforms that will not be accomplished, and people may unreasonably expect, perhaps, that when they get a lot of reforms on the statute books they will be better off. But, I repeat, it is an insult to the American people to harp on "mob rule" in connection with these reforms, as though the ruling instinct of the American people were really mob rule. As a matter of fact, I consider the American people an extremely patient and law-abiding people, and the most enduring sign of the Republic is the vast capacity for statesmanship resident in the body politic.

But while I entertain these views, into which I can not go now into detail, I have been entirely willing to submit this question to the people of Arizona. Whether they vote it up or down, the condition will have been complied with, and Arizona will enter the Union of States. It will be the same with New Mexico. If the people of New Mexico do not want to make their constitution amendable, they have only to put a cross mark in the proper place and the constitution of that State will take rank next to the Rock of Ages among things that are stable. [Laughter.] They naturally fear that any condition precedent endangers statehood, but once the matter is submitted to them I can not think that they will go deliberately to the polls and vote to tie their own hands indefinitely. The only organized opposition that there could be to such a reasonable proposition as is proposed by your committee would come from the special and selfish interests, whether industrial or political, which feel that by this instrument as it now stands they have secured themselves far beyond the time which would be voluntarily given them by a majority of the people of New Mexico.

I want to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I believe our committee has worked out in this proposition a solution that is absolutely fair to all parties and to all interests concerned and to both Territories, and that it is not in any sense a partisan proposition. We therefore invite to the support of this resolution all fair-minded, progressive Members of this body without regard to political distinctions. [Applause.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will; but I have concluded.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman has stated that by some subtle influence 51 per cent of the delegates to the constitutional convention so changed things as directed by the will of the people, that this hybrid constitution was evolved from their labors.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I stated that 51 of the 100 members were elected on a pledge for the initiative and referendum, and that when they got in they fell down and put in no initiative at all, and a referendum that is a mere farce.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Admitting that that subtle influence still remains in New Mexico, what guaranty is there that when this is submitted to the people they will vote to dispense with this hybrid constitution and get something else that is more in accord with progressive principles?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say that we have provided in section 4 of this resolution for a secret ballot. There is no Australian ballot system down there, they have the old antiquated system of ballots and open voting. I think that jarred some of our Republican brethren on the committee when it came out, but we have provided for a fairly secret ballot and thrown certain rudimentary safeguards about it. Besides, I think the people will not be subjected to the influences that were brought to bear upon a majority of the 100 men in the convention.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. One more question. The gentleman assumes therefore that there is a reasonable probability that this amendment will be adopted?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do. I honestly believe that there is an even chance for the adoption of this amendment. I can not mention names for it would not be fair to do so, but one of the leading Republicans who appeared before the Committee on Territories, a man who has occupied high official position in New Mexico, has stated that he would get out and take the stump for this substitute proposition if submitted to the people in New Mexico.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. There is another question I would like to ask: What was the compelling reason for the submission of the recall of the judiciary in the Arizona constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To meet the objections of the President.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I mean what was the compelling reason for putting it into the constitution? Was the judiciary so bad in Arizona that they wanted an easy method to rid themselves of it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is not a recall of the judiciary. It is a recall of all officers. The recall provides for the recall of all elective officers.

Mr. MANN. All elective officers whether elected or appointed.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Was there any particular argument urged against the judges in Arizona or any other place as a reason why this should be incorporated into the constitution?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. ANDREWS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the majority of the 100 delegates elected in New Mexico were instructed for the initiative and referendum and recall?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I was told 51 of the 100.

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, the gentleman is very much mistaken.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Not the recall.

Mr. ANDREWS. Or the initiative and referendum.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have been told that 51 of the 100 delegates to the New Mexico constitutional convention were elected on an initiative and referendum platform.

Mr. ANDREWS. Absolutely that is a mistake. In that convention there were 71 Republicans and 29 Democrats. Five Democrats were elected from Republican counties, nonpartisan. Now, in that caucus of Republicans I was present, and there were 70 Republicans present. On the question of the initiative and referendum, put squarely up to them by counties, 56 to 14 voted against the initiative and referendum.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am going to look over the hearings on this proposition——

Mr. ANDREWS. Well, I can not help the hearings. I am telling you the facts.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To ascertain what the authority is for the statement that has been made. I think other gentlemen have heard it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think the chairman has heard the statement made that 51 of the 100 were so instructed.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; it has been stated. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. ANDREWS] says is not a contradiction of what the gentleman from Colorado says. He merely states what was done in the caucus, and the gentleman from Colorado stated——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What was done in the districts or the counties where they were elected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 8.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the resolution passed by the Legislature of Alabama in regard to the bicentennial celebration at Mobile on May 26, 1911, be received.

The said resolution reads as follows:

"Senate joint resolution 52.

"[No. 241.]

"Whereas this year, 1911, is the two hundredth anniversary of the foundation and settlement of the city of Mobile, first capital of La Province de la Louisane, in 1711, and

"Whereas the city of Mobile and her people are making preparation for celebrating the event: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Alabama (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does hereby request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Alabama to bring the said anniversary celebration to the attention of Congress and the several departments of the United States Government and the representatives at Washington of foreign powers.

"Approved, April 6, 1911."

Be it further resolved, That the Congress of the United States acknowledges with pleasure the receipt of said resolution and appreciates the courtesy of the notice extended of that important event in the Nation's history.

Resolved further, That we commend the action of the city of Mobile in making preparations for this celebration. We regard that territory as one of the most valuable acquisitions of the Government and congratulate Alabama and the people of Mobile upon her growth as a city, and extend our best wishes for a successful celebration and a large attendance of patriotic American citizens.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the mayor of the city of Mobile in evidence of our appreciation of the work that will be done on May 26, 1911, in commemoration of the founding and settlement of our beautiful and progressive city on the Gulf.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. BURNHAM members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers on file with the Civil Service Commission.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE]. [Applause.]

Mr. LEGARE. Mr. Chairman, I wish in the outset to ask the courtesy of the House that I be not interrupted. My time is limited, I am not very strong, I speak with an effort, and unless some Member really wishes to ask me a question of considerable importance I shall appreciate the courtesy of being allowed to conclude my remarks without interruption.

Last year we passed an act which placed the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona on the threshold of statehood. In this act we authorized, empowered, and directed the people of these Territories to call a constitutional convention, adopt a constitution, submit it to the people for ratification, and then come back to us and to the President for approval. These conditions have been complied with in both Territories, and the people are now asking for this approval. If I should enter into a detailed explanation of these two constitutions after the able and exhaustive explanation of my friend the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], it would be surplusage and a useless waste of your time; but, Mr. Chairman, I wish simply and briefly to explain this bill. It calls for a vote by the people of New Mexico on two amendments to the constitution which they have adopted and a vote by the people of Arizona upon the question of recall of their judiciary. We do not require that they shall write it into their constitution in the shape of an irrevocable ordinance, but simply that they shall vote once more upon the question. At the same time we give them statehood.

Now, then, if it is the wish of these people that these two articles shall remain in their constitutions as they are now written, and a majority shall so elect, all well and good; but if, on the other hand, a majority of the people of the Territories wish to change these articles as amended, they are privileged to do so under the terms of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, what are these amendments? First, that the people of New Mexico shall have the right to vote once more upon article 19 of their constitution, which applies to the manner of amendment. The reason your committee gives to this House for placing this amendment in this resolution is it was assured by people from this Territory that as the constitution of New Mexico now reads it would be absolutely impossible to amend it within the next 25 years. The other article on which we say we would like them to vote once more in New Mexico is the one which relates to non-English speaking people holding office there. These people come to us from New Mexico, both Republicans and Democrats, and say that in the enabling act passed last year we have taken them by the throat and told them they must enact an irrevocable ordinance whereby no Spanish-speaking person can hold office in their State. They tell us, both factions, that some of the best people of their State and some of their most brilliant men are Spanish-speaking people; and believing, as we do, that we have no right to say to a sovereign State or a proposed sovereign State you must permit us to dictate your organic law, that we have no right to take them by the throat and force them to place in their constitution an irrevocable ordinance of this kind, we give them the opportunity of voting once more upon this question. So much for that amendment.

In regard to the amendment of the Arizona constitution our reasons are as follows: We wish to give the people of Arizona an opportunity of voting once more on the right of the recall of the judiciary. We believe, in fact, we are very certain, the President will not approve the constitution of Arizona with that article in it. Now, then, in this enabling act, strange as it may seem, there is no machinery provided whereby the people of Arizona, in the event of failure on the part of the President to approve this constitution, can recall or reconvene their convention. They are powerless. In other words, gentlemen, if the President fails to approve this constitution of Arizona the people are powerless and can not reconvene their convention for the purpose of changing or correcting this article and satisfying the President, but must stand idly by and be deprived of statehood until some new President shall occupy the White House or until Congress shall pass some law amending this enabling act. Now, then, I ask your attention to one thing in particular, and that is this: We do not say to the people of Arizona and of New Mexico, you must vote for these things, you must write these amendments into your constitution, and keep them there for all time. But we say to them, come into the Union. You are admitted into the Union, go ahead and elect your officers, and at the same time vote once more upon these propositions.

Under the resolution they lose no time; statehood is not delayed a single minute. They incur no extra expense. If the majority of the people want these amendments, they can get them. If a majority of the people are opposed to these amendments, they are not required to take them. In every event it is left to the people, a majority of the people, to write their own constitution. Now, gentlemen, those are the reasons in a nutshell and briefly expressed why the committee has placed these amendments in this resolution. I wish, however, personally to go a step further in this matter. I wish to record my protest against the recall feature of the Arizona constitution, especially the recall of the judiciary. I am opposed to the initiative and referendum. I can see no good to come of these new-fangled idiosyncracies. I can see that they will do harm. However, I realize they are political baubles which the demagogue can hand out to the people, toys with which the people may play without serious injury to themselves or to the country. We have too many laws as it is. We are grinding out new ones every day, but if every man who has a new idea is given the right to have it written into law; if every law enacted is referred to the people at an election for their ratification or rejection, it will in the end result in one continuous election and one great conglomeration of laws. However, it can not result in irreparable injury. The demagogue will have a market in which to manufacture and cry his wares, and I believe the people in time will weary of it and cry out against it.

I can even accept with equanimity this recall of officials other than judges. It is wrong, all wrong. It can do no good. It is unquestionably detrimental to the efficiency of the office, but, as a matter of fact, it can do very little permanent harm. But when you come to the recall of the judiciary, my every sense of right rebels and my every idea of a safe and stable government cries out against it [applause], because it is a blow at the strongest and most essential pillar of our Government. The Executive can go astray, but the court is there to bring him back into the paths of righteousness. The legislature can burst wide the bonds of constitutional limitation and wander afar into the field of illegality, but again the court is there to check this second great branch of our Government; but when you crush the power of the judiciary and lessen its efficiency, you make wreck and ruin of all that our fathers handed us in the shape of safe, stable, and lasting government. [Applause.]

This constitution of Arizona provides for the recall of a judge or other officer within from 20 to 35 days. In other words, when 25 per cent of the people voting at the last preceding general election shall have signed a petition and it is filed, the judge or other officer is given five days in which to resign, and if he fails to resign at the end of that time an election is ordered, not more than 30 or less than 20 days from the filing of the order; and on a ticket there is to be printed in 200 words or less the reason for his recall, and on that same ticket the judge, who possibly may be recalled because of some great decision that he has rendered, is required to write the reasons why he should not be recalled, in 200 words or less, and then his name with others is placed in nomination and voted upon.

Why, gentlemen, I can readily see how the efficiency of every little crossroads magistrate will be lowered and his decisions influenced and biased by having this sword of Damocles constantly hanging over his head. I can not fail to realize that every county sheriff will be tempted from time to time to fail of his duty, with this radical, drastic form of impeachment always staring him in the face.

I can hear now the cry of the angry mob as it struggles to gain possession of some poor, cowering wretch, whose only protection and safety are the bravery and manhood of a determined officer of the law; and when that officer shall have performed his duty and maintained the majesty and dignity of the law, I can see that same mob, defeated of its purpose and deprived of its prey, going to some place and signing the recall of that officer, whose only offense was that he obeyed the mandates of the law.

Some time ago the newspapers told how the mayor of the great city of Seattle, Wash., had been recalled because he was too lenient with the liquor men, too lax in the enforcement of the liquor laws. Not long after that the newspapers announced that the mayor of Tacoma, there in the same State, breathing the same atmosphere, operating under the same recall law, had been recalled because of his too strict enforcement of the liquor law. Wishing to be assured as to this, I went to a gentleman from Tacoma and asked him if it was true the mayor of his town had been recalled because of a too stringent enforcement of the liquor laws. "Why," he said, "no; that was partly it, but they recalled him because he stopped a prize fight." "Well," I said, "is not prize fighting unlawful and in violation of the law in Tacoma?" "Oh, yes," he said; "but the people wanted it. It helped the town. It brought crowds of people there, and they wanted it. There were 10,000 people gathered at the prize ring, waiting to see the fight, and when the mayor stopped it they left almost in a body and went directly down town and signed his recall."

Gentlemen, if this recall law applied to Members of Congress we would be in daily danger of its operation. There is always in every district in this Union a certain percentage of the electorate who are always against the incumbent. Watching your every utterance and act, this restless and dissatisfied element is always ready to take advantage of your every error and to stir up strife, and how easy it would be to secure 25 per cent of the signatures of voters to a petition. People sign almost any petition which is placed before them, and when 25 per cent of them have signed a petition for your recall, and that fact is published to the world, why the other 75 per cent immediately become suspicious of your actions, and before you have realized what has happened they have placed your name in nomination and you are recalled and damned and disgraced for all time.

It is not only the removal from office, it is not so much that you lose the position, not so much that your hopes are blighted and your ambitions crushed, but it is the disgrace that goes with it. It places the seal of disgrace upon the fair name you have heretofore borne unsullied and stamps you with a shame that will follow you for all time and be as a handicap to the children who come after you.

It is true we are liable to be removed at the end of every two years, but that is fair and to be expected. But this radical recall law places every man at a disadvantage and subjects him to the most degrading humiliation possible to befall a public servant.

Advocates of the measure will of course say it will not reach men who comply with the law and live up to the requirements of the office. But that is not true. It requires the officeholder to comply at all times with the fanciful everchanging will of the people. There comes a time in the life of almost every public man when he must either oppose a temporary popular sentiment or else bury his self-respect and smother the dictates of his conscience. If he is strong, if he withstands the temptation, if he fails to yield, history will tell of his statesmanship and greatness, but this can not be expected where there is a recall. The temptation is too great.

Did you ever stop to think of it? George Washington would have been recalled if this law had been in operation in his day and time. Abraham Lincoln would have been recalled more than once. William McKinley would have been recalled. Grover Cleveland would undoubtedly have been recalled during his second administration. All of these great men, around whose lives and actions are laid the foundation of our country's history, men whose names will live as long as this Union shall exist—aye, for long years thereafter—all of them, I say, would have been recalled, shorn of power, degraded, ruined, and damned for all time if they had held office subject to this recall law.

But great and powerful as these men were, they could have fallen victims to this law and the country had still lived and prospered. But it is not so with the judiciary. It is to this branch of our Government we must look for justice and protection. It is the only branch to which the minority can turn for preservation at all times. The executive and legislative are supposed to represent the majority, and loudly do they proclaim this fact, but the judiciary is the harbor of refuge to which the minority can flee when pursued by the majority or by the servants of its making. [Applause.]

Destroy this branch of our Government and you destroy the only hope of the minority, and at the same time you remove all restraint from the majority and leave them to be glutted with an unholy and uncontrollable power with which they will eventually destroy themselves and the country. When you write this recall of judges into a constitution you practically destroy the force and effect of the judicial branch of our republican form of government. You place the judge in a position where he is constantly tempted to yield between mob outcry and temporary popular sentiment on the one hand and law and order on the other. While he pens his opinion he hears the cry of the mob outside his window. He sees recall and shame and disgrace and blighted hope and crushed ambitions staring him in the face. It would be asking too much of human nature to expect him under such circumstances to defy the people. It would take a great strong man to do it, and you will not find strong men on a bench that is subject to recall. Nothing would tend sooner to mar the influence, lower the integrity, and degrade the judiciary than this recall law. No self-respecting man of wisdom and intelligence would wish to take the chances and sit upon a bench subject to the recall law.

It is true judges are not all good; they are not invulnerable; they often go astray and from time to time should be removed; but this class is small, and the old form of impeachment is good enough for me. It guarantees to a judge a fair trial by an intelligent jury. It is done with dignity; it is done deliberately. It is not done by a howling mass of men, drunk with power and bent upon doing him mischief. It is done by intelligent men, men of standing, and not by thugs and bums, and loafers, and drunkards, and sneak thieves, and criminals—men who are anxious to get even with the judge who passed sentence upon them and men who, by reason of passion and prejudice, are not fit to sit upon his case.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEGARE. I expect I will have to.

Mr. RAKER. It is not necessary unless the gentleman wants to.

Mr. LEGARE. Go ahead.

Mr. RAKER. The last class of men named by the gentleman, bums, thugs, and cutthroats—does the gentleman find those men entitled to sign a petition for a recall, and are these the men that the gentleman speaks of who will recall the judges or any other officer?

Mr. LEGARE. If a thug is an elector, under this law he can sign; if a bum or a drunkard is an elector, if he has the right to vote, he can sign. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, every State in this Union guarantees to its most depraved and corrupt criminal the right of trial by jury, that thing which has always been as a bulwark to our Anglo-Saxon liberty, one of those things for which our fathers fought and bled and died, when they wrested this land from the mother country. So far as I know, every State in this Union accords to its most depraved criminal the right to place every juror upon his voir dire—"juror, look upon the prisoner; prisoner, look upon the juror; what say you"—stand him aside or else place him upon his voir dire, and there the criminal is given the right to ascertain and find out from every juror who is to try his case whether he has formed or expressed an opinion, whether he is biased or prejudiced against his cause. But here in this recall law you are to make jurors of a man's accusors; you desire that he shall be tried and condemned and sentenced and punished by the men who have brought the indictment against him.

I ask you, is it fair, is it right, that the highest officer of your land shall be denied a privilege accorded your meanest criminal? Why, the very thought of it is repugnant to every sense of human decency. It is the rankest kind of political heresy. It is the result of the blatant, selfish, unreliable, and dangerous teaching of the demagogue. [Applause.] It is radicalism run rampant; it is socialism gone mad. [Applause.] But—and I say it with sorrow—these false, dangerous teachings emanate often from high places. Not long ago a gentleman in another legislative body within walking distance made one of those "I am holier than thou" speeches upon this same subject. I have read that speech carefully, and the more I read the more convinced did I become of the danger attached to this proposition. His whole speech is one of vituperation and abuse of all his legislative colleagues throughout the country. It teems with such phrases as these: "Petty bribery of the people's representatives everywhere," "infamous conduct of machine politics," "corrupt politicians," "corrupt special interests," "dishonesty and depravity"; in fact, it is simply a tirade of abuse of all branches of this Government, the judiciary coming in for its share. The whole official world is rotten; all men in public life are corrupt and corruptible, save him. It was not the effort of a statesman issuing a warning to his colleagues; it was rather the thunderous cry of the demagogue to the people, carrying false tidings, teaching false doctrines. Aye, yes, he goes on to say in one of his well-turned phrases, and here comes the rub, "It means more power to the people, and the people favor it." Of course they want it. They always want it. The people always cry aloud for more power. They grasp it readily whenever you place it within their reach, and unmindful of the fact that every cup of this demagogic honey which is handed them is saturated with deadly poison, they drink of it gladly and deeply, and even unto the dregs. If these men in high places continue these false teachings to their own aggrandizement in their efforts for political preferment, it means the wreck and ruin of our country.

Once convince an excited populace—and I am speaking plainly to you gentlemen of this House—that through means of this recall of the judiciary absolute control of the judges is placed directly within their hands, and no human agency can prevent their using that power rashly and recklessly at times, and there is danger that they will steer the old ship of state direct into the maelstrom, and will mean rebellion and revolution, bloodshed and anarchy.

Let no man misunderstand me; I have an abiding faith in the sober judgment of the American people, but I have a pronounced fear of the hasty action of any people under the stress of excitement, or worse, of want; and, in my judgment, the history of the human race bears unbroken testimony to the absolute necessity of the people in calmer moments denying to themselves the power that in such moments of passion, if exercisable, would result in flagrant disregard of the rights of a minority. It is against the efforts to arouse the passions and prejudices of the people by the assertion of the absence of any need of restraint of that power to which I seriously and strongly object. It is unfortunately true that the people, under the specious and demagogic appeals of leaders who lack the courage to tell them unpleasant truths, are liable to be tempted into a resumption of the power that in calmer moments they have denied themselves, and therefore have I said that the people are hungry for power.

I feel that the people of Arizona have not gone carefully into this matter; that they have not given due consideration to this article of their constitution. They have been rapping at the door of Congress year after year, decade after decade. They are wild to become one of the sisterhood of States; they are anxious to get in; they are hungry for it, and I believe would have voted for almost any law which was placed before them, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, while I do not question the right of a State or a proposed State to forge its own organic law, while I regard it as a constitutional right handed to us by the fathers and to be revered and held sacred, nevertheless I deem this radical, drastic recall feature of their constitution so dangerous to the safety and stability of the form of government under which we have lived and moved and had our being for more than a hundred years that I hesitate not in raising my voice against it. It is my wish that this State be forthwith and immediately admitted to the Union and enjoy all the rights and privileges to be derived therefrom, but at the same time I sincerely trust that the best there is in Arizona in the shape of conservative manhood and patriotic loyalty will unite to prevent this first step in the direction of tearing down so sacred an edifice; that they will not permit this foul blow to be struck the mother which is just about to give birth to their State. [Applause.] When the fathers contributed to these United States a Constitution they gave to our people the most wonderful system of government the world has ever known. The instrument is wonderful, and there is every reason why it should be.

There was gathered together here in America at that time the best brain and ambition of the old country. Brilliant men from every point of the compass; men who had wearied of the narrow, contracted, trammeled form of Old World government under which they had lived and were here in search of new fields in which to exploit their intelligence. Bringing with them, as they did, the best there was to be had from each form of government under which they had formerly lived, they discussed with each other and interchanged their ideas and views and theories for more than a hundred years before attempting the execution of their plans. There is no wonder, then, that the child of their making should be so great, so powerful, so wonderful, so strong, and so fully able to withstand the test of time. These master minds conceived the necessity for three branches of our Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. Time has proved the wisdom of their theory. Time has also proved that the judiciary is the strongest and most essential of the three.

Let us, then, whenever the opportunity presents, throw a cloak of protection around it. Let us teach the people safe and sane things. Let us point them to that which is good instead of handing them the worst there is in the way of legislation. Let us aid them in their effort to discern that which is to their best interest. Let us hand them sound, safe, wholesome, stable, lasting laws, under which they can move and live and have their being for all time, in prosperity and peace and happiness, instead of placing within their reach these unholy, vainglorious, temporary powers with which they will eventually pull down the temple upon their own heads. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. I take all the more pleasure in doing so because it will give to the good people of Arizona an opportunity to repudiate this radical, drastic, recall law which I believe has crept inadvertently into their constitution. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 14, to approve the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, and had directed him to report that the committee had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following requests for change of reference:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is hereby discharged from the further consideration of H. R. 5601, regulating commerce of convict-made goods, and the same is hereby referred to the Committee on Labor.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is hereby discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution 96, relating to the protection of watersheds of navigable streams, and the same is hereby referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether these requests for the transfer of a bill from one committee to another are at the suggestion of the parliamentary clerk or the committees themselves?

The SPEAKER. It is at the request of the gentlemen who introduced the bills, and with the approval of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. If it is done with the consent of the chairman of the committee who loses the bill there can be no objection, but if it is a mere request of a Member who introduced the bill it is a dangerous practice.

The SPEAKER. It is at the request of the chairman of the committee and the man who introduced the bill.

Mr. MANN. The chairman of the committee who now has the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

By unanimous consent the changes of reference were agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent the following leaves of absence were granted:

To Mr. GORDON, for three weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BATHRICK, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. EVANS, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. LEVER, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, for two weeks, on account of illness in family.

INVESTIGATION OF UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

House resolution 171.

Resolved, That the following Members shall constitute the committee provided for in House resolution 148: AUGUSTUS O. STANLEY (chairman), CHARLES L. BARTLETT, JACK BEALL, MARTIN W. LITTLETON, DANIEL J. MCGILLICUDDY, MARLIN E. OLMSTED, H. OLIN YOUNG, J. A. STERLING, H. G. DANFORTH.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. This is the nomination of a committee to be elected by the House. Will the gentleman inform the House how the committee was nominated?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The committee was nominated by several Members who were interested in the resolution. Any individual Member has the right to propose names.

Mr. MURDOCK. This is a new procedure, and one with which I am in hearty accord, but I wanted to know how the gentleman arrived at the nominations.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have nothing to withhold from the House. Those who are interested on this side of the House thought they were able to agree about the names, and did agree, and then I asked the minority leader on the other side to submit names, which he did, and we accepted them as suggested by him.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I am very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Texas. As to a proposition to investigate the greatest trust in the world, the gentleman from Texas says that some of the gentlemen on that side of the House are interested in it. I had supposed that the whole House and the whole country were interested in the proposition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. They are, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. I had supposed the whole majority side over there and some of the people on this side were interested, in addition to the leader of the minority, of whom the gentleman spoke. I shall not object, however. I shall vote for the resolution. But I should think, if any proposition of investigation were a matter for the consideration of the whole House, this would be it, and that it would be left to each side of the House to select its own members on the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman is correct, and the whole country is interested, and that side of the House is interested. Does the gentleman desire to offer any amendment or suggest any other name?

Mr. COOPER. Not now; no.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make an announcement, that one man here has the same right to make these nominations as any other, and if any Member does not like these nominations he has a perfect right to rise in his place and nominate somebody else. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following resolution and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 172.

Resolved, That the following Members shall constitute the select committee provided for in House resolution 157: THOMAS W. HARDWICK (chairman), FINIS J. GARRETT, WILLIAM SULZER, H. M. JACOWAY, JOHN E. RAKER, GEORGE R. MALBY, JOSEPH W. FORDNEY, E. H. MADISON, and ASHER C. HINDS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution, unless some gentleman——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, just for the purpose of making the RECORD show, I desire to ask the gentleman what this resolution pertains to?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To the Sugar Trust investigation.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to know how many Members of the committee on this side of the House—the majority Members—were present when these nominations were made?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. When the actual nominations were made, several Members; but I have talked with a number of Democrats on the subject and tried to confer with my party associates about the membership. The matter was submitted to the minority leader on the other side for suggestions as to his selections of committeemen.

Mr. BOOHER. How many members of the minority were present when the nominations were made on that side?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We did not have anything to do with that because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] acted for the minority.

Mr. BOOHER. Then the leader of the minority answered for his entire side?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I presume the leader of the minority answered for his side, and inasmuch as no gentleman on that side desires to amend the resolution, I imagine it is to the satisfaction of the Members on that side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask what the difference is between the old and the new way of selecting committees? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There is a great difference. Under the old rules the Speaker appointed. Under this new system the House elects. If the gentleman from Missouri desires to offer an amendment I would be glad to yield to him for that purpose, inasmuch as the matter is now in the hands of the House and there is no desire to throttle any individual Member.

Mr. BOOHER. No doubt the action of the gentleman is fair, but I, for one, have not been consulted in this matter. [Laughter.] The names, however, are perfectly satisfactory to me. I just wanted to find out how you did it. I have found out and now I am satisfied. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas one or two questions, if I may. I understood the Democratic caucus adopted a resolution to the effect that the Committee on Ways and Means should be constituted, so far as the Democratic membership of the House is concerned, a committee on committees, and should report its nominations for various committees to the Democratic caucus for ratification.

Mr. GARRETT. Those were subcommittees.

Mr. KENDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. I will wait until the gentleman from Texas yields to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] first.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas if the Democratic members of this committee have been selected by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will recall the resolution of the caucus which provided for constituting the Ways and Means a committee on committees, it referred only to standing committees. The select and conference committees were left to be selected by the Speaker of the House, but in these two particular instances, following the precedent set in the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy, we thought it better to submit this directly to the membership of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but if the gentleman will permit me to suggest, in the Ballinger investigating resolution it was provided, against my opposition, that the membership of the committee should be elected, and the Democratic members of the committee elected in a Democratic caucus. After the majority of the House, with the aid of the Executive, declined to accept the recommendations of the Democratic caucus, the Democratic caucus reconvened and selected another Member in place of the Member who seemed to be particularly obnoxious to the administration as a member of that committee. Now, my position on the selection of the committees of the House has never been in doubt. I have always favored, as the gentlemen know, the selection of the committees by the Speaker, and I know that no Speaker would select a committee of this character without consultation with the Members——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman does not wish me to make the statement——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Go ahead.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know that no Speaker would select a committee of this character without consultation with Members on his own side of the House, at least. For my part, I am unable to see any distinction between the selection of a committee in this way—and I am not referring to the personnel of the committee, because I hardly heard the names read—under the pretense of electing a committee and the selection by the Speaker himself. My understanding was when the House was to elect committees for any purpose, that—so far, at least, as the Democratic membership of the House was concerned—the selections would be nominated to the Democratic caucus, to be ratified by the caucus, and then submitted to the House, and at least we would have the pretense of having the party in control pass in advance upon the selection. Having said that much, and being indifferent to the personnel of the committee——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman says is quite true, and I know what his position has been in regard to the selection of committees; but this only demonstrates to him how easily and how harmoniously this House can elect its committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I deny the gentleman's assertion, because, even if in my opinion some of the selections named in this resolution were ill-advised, a knowledge of conditions in this House, not only as at present constituted, but as constituted during my service in the House, would warn me of the inadvisability of venturing a suggestion that changes should be made in the personnel of the committee as sent to the desk by the gentleman from Texas; and I wish to say this, that so far as I am concerned such a resolution to elect a committee for any purpose in this form will not slip through in the future as easily as this resolution will at this time. A different course will have to be pursued in the future.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman from Texas not think that this method of coming suddenly into the House here and letting a cat out of a bag is equivalent to transferring from the Speaker's control into the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Rules this tyranny we heard so much about in the last Congress?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I hardly think so. I did not let a cat out of the bag suddenly. I think the gentleman got a good look at the cat several hours ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I just wanted to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that if the gentleman from New York got a look at the cat several hours ago that is more than the gentleman from Colorado got. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman had wanted to see the cat, if he had come to me at any time, I would have been glad to make profert of it before it was put in the bag.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say now that I did not know that the gentleman from Texas had charge of the cat. [Laughter.] I did not know that the cat was in his sack, or in anybody's sack, or in whose sack it was, but I should certainly like to have been consulted about the make-up of this committee. My constituents are deeply interested in the make-up of this committee and in the work of investigation that it is about to undertake. I am taking no exception to the personnel of this committee. So far as I know it is all right, although I confess that I do not know very far just at this juncture; but I do know that I have not been consulted in any way whatever about this committee and did not even know that the matter was to be brought before the House at this time. I thought we were going to caucus on this thing. I made the request, I will say to the Speaker, that I be consulted about this matter before these appointments were decided upon, and I made that request in writing.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman that this is left entirely with the membership of the House; and if the gentleman wishes to offer any amendment, I have not the slightest objection to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Why, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman perfectly understands the futility of offering an amendment to this proposition.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Who did the gentleman talk with in the selection of these names?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I think gentlemen who are on the Ways and Means Committee and several gentlemen who are on the various other committees of this House, and I talked with the gentleman from Indiana about the passage of the resolution——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes; but not about the membership.

Mr. HENRY of Texas (continuing). Some time ago, but I do not recall talking about the membership, but the gentleman was in the committee room, and I would have been very glad to have talked it over with him at the time.

Mr. COX of Indiana. My only purpose in coming before the committee was this, as to whether the resolution embodied a proposition to investigate anything that might relate to frauds on the customs in relation to sugar. It is the only thing I discussed with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman I had no desire to overlook any gentleman, and if I have any selection of committees in the future I invite every one of the Democrats to come and talk with me and give me their views. I would like to have the views of all of them.

Mr. COX of Indiana. In response to that I want to say I am thoroughly in accord with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], not as against the personnel of a single member of this committee, but as to the mode of procedure.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Probably the next time I will suit the gentleman and leave it to the Speaker to select these committees; maybe we can get together on the proposition next time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What does the gentleman mean when he says, "select committees in the future?"

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not say when we select the committees, but I said if I should ever be compelled to select them again, which I hope will not be the case.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Again?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman has been on the committee on patronage and knows something about the difficulties.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman says if he should ever be compelled to select a committee again. Was he compelled to select this one?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think, on account of the exigency of the case, you might say when it becomes necessary for a committee to be selected in this way——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In this way or by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Texas why this matter was not submitted to the Democratic caucus or at least some knowledge given to the membership of the House [applause on the Democratic side] that the gentleman from Texas was charged with the extraordinary duty of naming this committee for the House. As for myself I did not know until this minute that this committee was to be named in the manner it is. I did not know until this moment who was to be a single member of this committee. I submit that this is not the proper way to name committees of this House. The way to have named this committee was to take it to the Democratic caucus and let the Republicans take theirs to a Republican caucus, and when it had been worked out let the parties come in here and let the committees be elected. I do not know who may be upon this committee. I did not know until the gentleman from Texas said he did it that he was charged with the duty to name this committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I understood the gentleman to say he was compelled to do it. Now, I am willing to trust the gentleman from Texas as far as I am willing to trust any man in this House. I believe he is as good a man as any in the House, but I am not willing to trust him or any other man to do for the House what this House is able to do for itself. It is just such a policy as this that brings this body into disrepute.

This ought to stand, Mr. Speaker, to us as a warning. The great body of the American people is the ruling power here, and that rule ought to come through a free consultation and a free action of the Members of this House. I protested before—I protested for four long years—on this floor against such methods as this. I protest now, Mr. Speaker, in the name of the American people, that such policy as is now being inaugurated is un-Democratic and un-American. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this House who would more quickly yield to the majority of his associates in caucus than myself. I had not the slightest objection to submitting the names to a Democratic caucus and letting the Democrats pass on them.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Wait just a moment, until I get through. But, Mr. Speaker, when a majority of the Committee on Rules—aye, every member of the Committee on Rules, both Democrats and Republicans—agreed that this resolution should be adopted and the committee elected, I do not see the sense in submitting it to a caucus where we all agreed. No injustice has been done the party, and none has been done the country.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to inquire whether this resolution in terms did not provide that the membership of the committee should be elected by the House?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It did.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, why is not that done, and what body in this House had the right to take charge of the selection of that membership, other than the Democratic caucus for the Democratic Members and the Republican caucus for the Republican Members?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman might with equal propriety have said that the resolution should have been submitted to the Democratic caucus. Some gentlemen are trying to stir up a controversy about nothing. There is absolutely nothing in it. If those gentlemen desire the matter to go to the Democratic caucus, let them make the motion.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will make the motion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to arrogate to myself any authority. I am here to serve the Democratic Party and the country. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to this matter being referred to a Democratic caucus, as proposed by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and I will try to give my reasons for it. I think it ought to be an important subject and an important event, that would bring the Democratic caucus together. Surely and certainly the Rules Committee, which the Democratic caucus elected, had judgment enough and patriotism enough and loyalty enough to our party to make fair and good selections without calling a Democratic caucus together. [Applause.] It concerns me but little whether the Ways and Means or Rules Committee had authority to make these nominations. Are the men named the proper men? There is too much danger in a Democratic caucus to call one to pass on unimportant matters. Probably the "Rules" Committee did not have the authority to name this committee, which I am advised is to investigate the Steel and Sugar Trusts.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This is merely a nomination. It is a nomination only. The House can act on it.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the gentleman suppose——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas yielded to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to referring the ratification of the nominations made by the Rules Committee to the Democratic caucus, because I do not believe that on all occasions and at all times and in all small matters and unimportant incidents occurring on this floor or elsewhere, we have not confidence in the leaders we have made, but should appeal to the caucus. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be understood as criticizing a Democratic caucus. I always stand by the voice of a caucus of my party. But what I mean now to say, do not call a caucus about all kind of small matters. The caucus will become common. We have appointed a Committee on Rules and our Committee on Ways and Means, and, it seems to me that we are making a mountain out of a very small molehill to demand at this late hour that the gentlemen whose names are submitted to the House by the Rules Committee to make these investigations should be withdrawn by the chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. HENRY of Texas] and carried before a Democratic caucus. This is merely a nomination, as the chairman of the Rules Committee suggests. We can defeat the nominations here on the open floor of the House if we have the desire to do so. I have not heard the names of the gentlemen submitted, because I came in on the floor of the House after this matter was called up, but I can say, inasmuch as the matter has proceeded thus far, I am prepared to vote for the nominations made by the Rules Committee. This scene here on the floor will be sufficient admonition that hereafter a Democratic caucus will handle such matters. I am not, Mr. Speaker, an advocate of frequent and numerous caucuses. Where vacancies occur on committees, I thought the Ways and Means Committee filled them. Too much talking will get the Democratic Party into trouble, and we are afraid of that. In our caucuses thus far we have done well.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KENDALL. I wanted to inquire of the gentleman from Texas if hereafter it is to be the policy of the majority to select special committees in this way?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will say candidly that I hope not. I hope that the Speaker will appoint select committees as the rules prescribe. In answer to another question of the gentleman, whether any gentleman would desire to offer a substitute, I will say that I hardly think so, because the numerous gentlemen with whom I have conferred about the personnel of the committee have done the work so well it can hardly be improved.

Mr. KENDALL. I do not suppose anybody would impeach the personnel of the committee.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas how many members of the Rules Committee are on the two investigating committees?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Three on this side.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How many on the other?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. One.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Four in all.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman from Missouri desires, we will remove one of them and put him on.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is a very pleasant piece of sarcasm, but has the gentleman authority to do that?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I might obtain authority.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask if, as a matter of fact, the Rules Committee did not nominate this committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; it did not.

Mr. SISSON. They did not nominate?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. They were a small fraction of those consulted.

Mr. SISSON. From the number of interrogatories that have been propounded it seems that there were a large number that were not consulted.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Those interrogatories were all good-natured, and of course we unintentionally overlooked some important Members. It was not possible to reach all.

Mr. SISSON. And so is mine.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. SISSON. How many gentlemen among the Democrats were consulted?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why, it really seems to me as if I talked with a majority of Democratic Members about these resolutions and the committees.

Mr. SISSON. I believe if the gentleman would submit it to the membership of the House he would find that not one-tenth of them were consulted.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I am not sure but that I consulted with the gentleman from Mississippi himself. Of course he will remember. There is no man in this House that I would go to sooner than to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I appreciate the gentleman's good opinion, but I want to say that he has not, directly or indirectly, consulted with me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I shall not be guilty of that offense again.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In view of all that has been said in the last few minutes, would the gentleman from Texas be willing to withdraw the resolution and let it go over?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; I insist that the House shall elect the committee. We have nominated the committee, now let the House take what course it sees proper.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman will see that many Members are not pleased, and that they are not satisfied with the methods that have been selected in nominating the committee. It occurred to me that it would be the part of wisdom to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote. I want to say that I offer to yield for amendment as to new names.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield for any amendment of that sort. That is dilatory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the motion to commit is a privileged motion, and that the House has a right to commit this resolution, if it so desires, to any committee it pleases.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say that I am chairman of a little committee of which one of the members has resigned. That resignation has been put before the House, but I understand that in order to supply his place there will have to be a Democratic caucus to agree on a member before it can properly come before the House. I know that there will be no controversy or contest as to who the new committeeman may be, but I want to suggest as a solution of this matter now before the House and to avoid any friction would be to ask for a Democratic caucus, and that this resolution be submitted to that caucus for confirmation along with supplying the vacancy in my committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, that is specially provided for by the rule—the case that the gentleman alludes to. The rule provides that vacancies in the standing committees shall be filled in the same manner as the original committees are made up.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman know whether this information which I received is true? I have been informed by a Member of the House that one of the gentlemen selected by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to represent the minority on this committee was up to the time of his election as a Member of this House a local attorney for the Steel Trust. Does the gentleman know whether that is true or not?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. COOPER. I have been informed by a Member of the House that one of the Members appointed or selected by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to represent the minority upon this committee on investigation was, up to the time of his election to membership in this House, the local attorney for the Steel Trust. Does the gentleman know whether that is true or not?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois to answer that question, although that resolution has already passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if that be the case, I was not aware of it.

The SPEAKER. This whole discussion about the Steel Trust investigation committee is out of order.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENDALL. I understand the question before the House now to arise upon the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to commit the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means. Is that a debatable proposition?

The SPEAKER. It is. The question is on committing this resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi to withdraw the motion. I think that the rules prescribe that the Speaker shall appoint the select committees of the House. The Ways and Means Committee has been appointed by the caucus, and only by caucus action to select, subject to caucus approval, the standing committees of the House. There were personal reasons, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], why I did not desire these resolutions to go to the Ways and Means Committee. I will say that one of them is a question of investigation of the United States Steel Corporation. For personal reasons I did not desire to participate in the selection of the committee to investigate the United States Steel Corporation. I did not wish to take part in the selection of that committee. Probably the gentleman can understand the position that I am in. If the occasion should arise again, the sentiment on this side of the House has clearly demonstrated that the desire of this side of the House is that similar committees shall be selected by the caucus, unless the Speaker appoints. I understand there is no issue made on the personnel of this committee, and I hope the gentleman will let it go for the present.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection to the Speaker appointing these committees, or recommending these committees, to the House. I would have no objection to any committee or anybody that had heretofore been authorized, either under the rules or under the Democratic caucus, making the selection; but I do want to protest against a few gentlemen getting together and consulting around very quietly about who shall go on a committee and then bringing the resolution all cut and dried into the House. It is embarrassing to gentlemen on this side of the House to object to the personnel of a committee selected in that way, and I have absolutely no objection to the personnel of this committee. These gentlemen are all friends of mine, and I believe the committee selected to be a good one. I presume the protest on the part of others springs from the same source or reason that it does with me—not that I have anything against the personnel of either of these committees. Mr. Speaker, in view of the request made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if I may be permitted to do so, I ask that this matter be referred back to the Committee on Rules—and so change my motion—and let the Rules Committee consider the matter; and we have an opportunity then to either report it to the caucus or give the membership of the House an opportunity to consider the matter.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Mississippi understand that one of these committees has already been selected by the House and the motion to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table has been adopted? Now, it seems to me the only question coming up here is the mode of procedure and not the personnel of these committees. Now, to have adopted one of these committees and to send the other back to a caucus or back to the Committee on Rules would bring up some question of their personnel.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if the membership were taken by surprise as I was, I did not know exactly, as Tom Watson said, where I was at, the thing went through so quickly; and I will say to the gentleman from Texas I do earnestly hope that if we dispose of this matter in a proper way we may obtain unanimous consent to have that other matter referred back to the proper committee, so they would be both attended to.

Mr. GARNER. If I may be able to testify, as the gentleman from Mississippi has, I was not myself consulted about this matter. I did not know it was even coming up, and a great many Members have not been consulted sitting back here; but having already adopted one of these resolutions, now you would have us undo that, and I am not sufficiently acquainted with the rules to know just how you would undo it after you had made the motion to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table. If we send the other resolution back, it would go to the country, possibly, that those gentlemen who had been selected were not satisfactory to the House, and therefore the resolution was sent back for the purpose of looking them over again, and it would be a reflection on these gentlemen, which I do not believe the House ought to make.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, just a word. As chairman of the Committee on Rules, I desire to say that the responsibility was put on that committee. We have not arrogated to ourselves any authority. We understand how jealous, and rightly so, Members have been of their prerogatives as Representatives in this House. We are not trying to dictate to the Democracy or the membership of this House, but here was the responsibility coming up that could be solved by your committee. Now, how much better off would you be if you submitted it to some other committee and let them pass on it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In a moment. The gentleman says he was taken by surprise. There is never a day in this House that I am not taken by surprise when some matter is called up, and if any committee must go around and consult every individual Member before they take action, we would make poor progress in our proceedings. There is nothing in this proposition. Why, we have no ambition to select these men. The Committee on Rules does not aspire to do it. It is a large proposition when you investigate the great trusts. The Committee on Rules have unanimously agreed upon two resolutions, and no man can raise his voice against a single member of this committee proposed. Then why, forsooth, kick up a row about nothing? Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely, with all due respect to gentlemen who differ, ridiculous and absurd in the extreme.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have about five minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield the gentleman five minutes' time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in justice to the gentlemen who are named by the pending resolution I should say that I was not in the Hall of the House when another resolution, as I am informed, was presented and adopted, because if I did not say this much it might appear as if my suggestion, coming at the time it did, in some manner did involve the Members named in this particular resolution. Had I been in the House then I would have voiced the same objection to the resolution naming the Members to investigate the steel companies that I have made to this resolution.

Suppose the Committee on Appropriations had proposed this select committee, and it would have had just as much right as the Committee on Rules to do it, the House having provided that the members of two select committees should be elected. Suppose, I repeat, the Committee on Appropriations had done this, and I take the Committee on Appropriations since, in that event, the criticism now made would be directed at myself. Suppose that committee had undertaken the selection of this investigating committee and had gone ahead and selected the Members on this side of the House, and then suppose we had consulted the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the minority members, and then suppose I had presented a resolution, naming men that nobody could have criticized and nobody could have offered any objection to, and presented that resolution as matter of privilege. I would have put this side of the House in the same embarrassing position as it is now put in by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] when he assumes authority and presents a resolution of this kind.

I do not concede for an instant that any duty devolved upon the Committee on Rules in this connection. In the first place, there is nothing in the practice heretofore followed or anything that the Democratic caucus has done which justifies the statement that the Committee on Rules had any duty devolving upon it to select the personnel of these investigating committees.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that if the Committee on Appropriations had presented or reported a resolution carrying with it the proposition to select members of the committee, and had he submitted the resolution and personnel of the committee, most certainly I would not have objected to it, because he would have been strictly within his rights and within the rules of propriety, and I do not see how any other idea could be entertained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I disagree with the gentleman, and must say that if I had done so I should have expected this House to have rejected the resolution without any hesitation. It would have been an unwarranted presumption on my part and on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to have presumed to act as a nominating committee to this House.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman made a statement that the Committee on Rules, as I understand, had made the nominations. I wish to state that the Committee on Rules has never had this matter under consideration in any form whatever. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to charge the Committee on Rules with any offense, but I understood the chairman of the Committee on Rules to make the statement that this duty had devolved upon the Committee on Rules and that the Committee on Rules had acted accordingly. My objection is very simple. I believe the proper thing to have done was to have placed the responsibility for the selection of the members of this committee on the Speaker of the House. I believe that is where the responsibility should fall.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just a minute, when I finish this statement. I do not know anybody who would have dared for an instant to have impugned the selections he would have made. But nobody else has any authority to make the selections. It is an unwarranted assumption, and I do not say that in a manner to be taken offensively, personally, but I do as a Member of this body consider it an unwarranted assumption of authority for any committee to present nominees in this House, and to put Members in a position where they would be embarrassed if they had objections against the nominees. There might be some perfectly legitimate reasons why certain Members should not be on some of these committees, and those reasons would not be discussed in the open, but if they were called to the attention of the nominating committee, the nominating committee could have considered the objections and taken such action as might be proper under the circumstances.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman does not believe that the caucus ought to nominate or the House elect committees under any circumstances, does he?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe that as the Democratic caucus adopted the practice of electing committees of the House; that as long as my party adopted that policy I am perfectly willing to acquiesce in it, and I did acquiesce in it. I made that statement when the question was up in the Democratic caucus. But that does not justify me or the gentleman from Kentucky or the gentleman from Virginia or any other gentleman in the House when the House has adopted a resolution to elect members of certain committees to consult a number of gentlemen and then offer a resolution naming certain men. It is a privileged resolution, difficult if not impossible to interfere with, and to assume the prerogative that the Speaker has heretofore exercised is the arrogation of a power that ought not to be allowed.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman spoke of some Member not being acceptable to all the Members of the House. If the gentleman from New York desires to offer an amendment to substitute some other Member, he can do so. Is there any Member on this committee to whom he objects?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know, because I do not know the personnel of the committee. I have no desire to offer a substitute. If there were some reason, in my judgment, that would make it inopportune to name any gentleman on the committee, I would not say it here and no other man would. He would make the statement to whoever he was conferring with about the selection of the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This is the place to offer an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no desire to offer an amendment, but I want to enter my emphatic protest against any Member not authorized by the rules or by the policy or the custom of the Democratic Party presenting as a matter of privilege a resolution nominating a committee to be elected by the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman has made charges against the Rules Committee——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have made no charges against the Rules Committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas (continuing). About arrogating authority. I ask him if he is satisfied with the Members selected from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know who the Members are that are selected from New York.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. LITTLETON and Mr. SULZER.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not going to discuss them. If I were dissatisfied I would not express an opinion here, and I am not going to express any opinion about any of the Members named in the resolution. I am dissatisfied with the action of the gentleman from Texas, or whoever is responsible for arrogating to himself or to any committee the right of nominating the committee. It is, in effect, the exercise of the power of appointment. That is what it amounts to, and if it would be improper to lodge that power in the Speaker it is just as improper to lodge it in any other Member of the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of no quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 17, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 850) to amend an act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa," approved June 6, 1874 (Rept. No. 26); and

A bill (S. 144) to legalize a bridge across the Pend Oreille River in Stevens County, Wash. (Rept. No. 25).

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2003) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payments for work already done under public contracts, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 28) thereon.

Mr. BURNHAM. A number of petitions have been received relating to cold storage, which have been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. As the bill (S. 136) to prevent the sale or transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of articles of food held in cold storage for more than the time herein specified, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, is in the hands of the Committee on Manufactures, I report back the petitions and move that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS AT PORT ANGELES, WASH.

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 339) providing for the reappraisement and sale of certain lands in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 24) thereon. It is a short bill and a similar measure has previously passed the Senate. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF FISHERIES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 12) to give effect to the provisions of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the fisheries in boundary waters contiguous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada, signed at Washington on April 1, 1908, and ratified by the United States Senate April 13, 1908.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not object to the request made by the Senator from Michigan, but I give notice that I shall object to further requests for unanimous consent to consider bills until the morning business has been concluded. I will do so after this matter has been disposed of.

Mr. JONES. Unless there is some special reason why this bill should be passed soon, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan to let it go over for a short time, because I had considerable correspondence with some gentlemen from my State with reference to this measure before it was reported. I have written to them and sent them a copy of the report and bill, and I wish to find out whether they have any objection to urge against the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the object in pressing the bill for final passage is this: The treaty between these two countries was made and promulgated three years ago. In order to give it effect the regulations must be agreed upon between the two countries, and the regulations as they appear in Senate bill 12 have been agreed upon. They affect the right of fishermen to use certain sized nets in boundary waters, and if the treaty regulations are to go into effect, the fishermen must have ample notice of that fact. Otherwise they will not know what to do with reference to the purchase of new nets.

We have held the bill for over a year, in order to correct some of its details. About every section of the country directly affected by it has been consulted, and I had supposed that the interests of the Pacific coast, as well as all other interests affected, were perfectly satisfied with the regulations.

I do not like to be insistent when a Senator asks that we may delay a measure, and I could not proceed with it except by unanimous consent; but the Committee on Foreign Relations directed me to make this report, and have asked me to bring it to the attention of the Senate. I have done so; but I am not going to press it if the Senator from Washington asks for further time.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I am satisfied I can get word by Monday, and I really do not anticipate from my examination of the bill and the report that there will be any objection at all to the measure. But these gentlemen presented such serious objections to the regulations as they were proposed that I felt I ought to submit the matter to them before the passage of the bill. So I ask that it may go over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under the circumstances, I will withdraw the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan withdraws the request for the consideration of the bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOHN B. LEE.

COST OF LIVING IN AMERICAN TOWNS.

On motion of Mr. SMOOT, it was Ordered, That 500 copies of Senate Document No. 22, on Cost of Living in American Towns, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

THE STANDARD OIL CO. ET AL. V. THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received many telegrams and letters this morning from different sections of the country asking that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case be printed as a public document (S. Doc. No. 34). I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the decision be printed, and also that the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan be printed in the same document—5,000 copies for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan probably has not been fully prepared or revised, and if the opinion of the majority of the court, delivered by the Chief Justice, is printed, I suggest that the dissenting opinion as delivered from the bench, and which has been published, go along with the main opinion at the same time.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator object to withholding the publication of the document until the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan is ready?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not object to taking time to get both complete, but I object to printing the main opinion first and the dissenting opinion afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. I will see that the document is not printed until both opinions are ready.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order will then be, if there be no objection, that both opinions be printed in one document.

DEMOCRACY AND ART.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to have printed as a document an article by Dr. W. K. Bush-Brown on the subject of "Democracy and art." I ask that the article be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper presented by the Senator from Idaho will be referred to the Committee on Printing for recommendation.

PULP AND NEWS-PRINT-PAPER INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 31), which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a report on the pulp and news-print-paper industry by the Tariff Board. In response to a resolution of the Senate dated February 23, 1911, I forwarded a report by the Tariff Board answering as far as practicable the inquiries of that resolution. That report contained a preliminary report on the pulp and news-print-paper industry.

As will be seen from the letter of transmittal, the present report is not a supplement to the preliminary report, but is a complete unit in itself.

Mr. JONES. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 44), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate be, and it is hereby, directed to report to the Senate, at as early a date as possible in the next regular session of Congress, upon the power and authority of the National Government over the development and use of water power within the respective States, and especially—

First. Has the National Government any authority to impose a charge for the use of water power developed on nonnavigable streams, whether State or interstate?

Second. Has it any authority in granting permits to develop water power on a navigable stream to impose and enforce conditions relating to stated payments to the Government, regulation of charges to consumers, and determination of the right to make use of such developed power?

Third. Has it authority in disposing of any of its lands, reserved or unreserved, necessary and suitable for use in connection with the development or use of water power on a nonnavigable stream, whether State or interstate, by lease or otherwise, to limit the time for which such development may continue or to impose and enforce charges for the use and development of such water power or to control and regulate the disposition of such water power to its consumers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 3) was read, as follows:

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. CRAWFORD obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment to present a matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

MEMBER OF BOARD OF MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. WARREN. Last month I introduced and asked for the consideration of a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) for appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. The man whose name I presented is an ex-Senator who has done faithful and valuable service in the United States Senate, an old soldier who served with distinction through the Civil War, and always the friend of the soldier, whether in public or private life. Although the measure carried unanimously, a motion to reconsider has since been entered. I now wish to present a letter from ex-Senator Scott, which I ask may be read, and then I will ask unanimous consent to strike from the calendar the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR WARREN: In your personal friendship for me you introduced a joint resolution naming me as a member to fill a vacancy on the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The resolution was offered without my knowledge, as you know. I am informed that a member of the Military Committee objects. I therefore ask that you withdraw the said resolution.

Thanking you and my former associates in the Senate for the prompt passage of the resolution, I remain, Yours, very truly, N. B. SCOTT.

MAY 10, 1911.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to strike from the calendar Order No. 1, which is the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the previous action of the Senate will have to be reconsidered——

Mr. WARREN. Very well. Then I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (continuing). As a motion to reconsider is pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry. What would be the effect upon the order of business already established of taking up this matter for consideration? The Senate has voted to take up for consideration——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is occupying the floor by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. By consent of the Senator having the floor and by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, but if the Senate takes up for consideration another legislative matter, it seems to me it will displace the joint resolution called up by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. Oh, no.

Mr. WARREN. We are still in the morning hour——

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. And I asked unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked the Chair as a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a question of laying aside House joint resolution 39, because that comes up on motion; but it can be temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent and this measure disposed of, and then the Senate will return to the consideration of the House joint resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that; but it has not been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not need to be temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent. It can be displaced by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to preserve the order that has been established. I have no objection whatever to the motion proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood, when the Senator from Idaho yielded to the Senator from Wyoming, that he would allow him temporarily to displace the House joint resolution and dispose of this measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from South Dakota addressed the Chair presumably upon the joint resolution which had already been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the Senator from South Dakota yielded to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. For this purpose only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming thereupon asked unanimous consent to dispose of this measure now, and as there was no objection the measure was taken up.

Mr. CUMMINS. If after the disposition of the matter proposed by the Senator from Wyoming the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution at once takes its place before the Senate, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly it will, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the votes by which the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) for appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, be reconsidered, with a view of thereafter moving the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution.

Mr. BROWN. Before that order is made I simply desire to say that I entered the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, not in any spirit of hostility at all to ex-Senator Scott. I have great personal regard and admiration for him as a man and as one of the defenders of the country when it needed a defense. My only purpose was, not being present when the joint resolution was adopted, to give the Grand Army people of my State an opportunity to be heard. They had written to me with regard to the vacancy which had been caused by the death of one of the past commanders of that State, and I entered the motion in order to hold it in statu quo until I might hear from them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, on January 26, 1911, the President of the United States sent a special message to the two Houses of the Sixty-first Congress, transmitting correspondence embodying an agreement between the Department of State and the Canadian Government in regard to certain proposed reciprocal tariff legislation; also statistical information showing the effect of the proposed agreement upon the commerce and revenues of the United States and the Dominion of Canada. No more important and notable document has been received from a President of these United States in many a year.

It is of the highest importance, because it proposes a complete—and I may say radical—change in the policy and attitude of the Government of the United States toward what has heretofore been regarded as the most fundamental as well as the greatest of all our industries—agriculture—its purpose being to remove absolutely all duties from the farm products hereafter grown in the Dominion of Canada, a great empire with unlimited possibilities for the growth of identically the same crops as those grown throughout the northern part of the United States; an empire stretching in vast area 3,700 miles across our entire northern boundary; the only country in the world whose people can compete with ours, on the North American Continent, in the production and sale of Temperate Zone soil products; it proposes to exempt these products from all duty, whether for revenue or protection, and to allow them henceforth free access to the markets of the United States upon a basis of absolute equality with the products of the farms in this country.

It is a notable document because of its great clearness of statement, the kindliness of the sentiment it expresses, the loftiness of its tone, and the desire so deeply manifest to promote a feeling of amity and good will between two kindred peoples. The President says:

> This trade agreement, if entered into, will cement the friendly relations with the Dominion which have resulted from the satisfactory settlement of the controversies that have lasted for a century and further promote good feeling between kindred peoples. * * * The geographical proximity, the closer relation of blood, common sympathies, and identical moral and social ideas furnish very real and striking reasons why this agreement ought to be viewed from a higher plane.
> Since becoming a nation Canada has been our good neighbor, immediately contiguous across a wide continent without artificial or natural barrier, except navigable waters used in common. She has cost us nothing in the way of preparations for defense against her possible assault, and she never will. She has sought to agree with us quickly when differences have disturbed our relations. She shares with us common traditions and aspirations.

Notwithstanding the fine optimism with which the President commends the proposed measure, he is cautious in what he says about its bringing about a reduction in the cost of living in the United States. He says:

> I do not wish to hold out the prospect that the unrestricted interchange of food products will greatly and at once reduce their cost to the people of this country. * * * Reciprocity with Canada must necessarily be chiefly confined in its effect on the cost of living to food and forest products. The question of the cost of clothing as affected by duty on textiles and their raw materials, so much mooted, is not within the scope of an agreement with Canada, because she raises comparatively few wool sheep and her textile manufactures are unimportant.

So the President, who is its most enthusiastic advocate, makes no promise that this measure will reduce the cost of food products to the consumer in the United States; he frankly admits that it will not in the slightest degree affect the cotton and woolen schedules, and that the cost of clothing will not be reduced in any manner as the result of its enactment.

If this proposed law is not to reduce the cost of food products, nor of clothing, to the consumers in this country, are we to enact it simply upon the ground that it will "cement the friendly relations" already existing between the Dominion and the United States?

Those relations have been unbroken for a hundred years. Is there any need just now of changing our policies, in order that they may continue in the future as they have in the past? Are we not enjoying our full share of the Dominion's trade now?

In the year 1910 Canada's total trade with the world was $693,211,221. Her imports were $385,833,103. Of this amount she imported $233,071,155 from the United States, and only $152,763,910 from the rest of the world. She bought from the people of the United States what amounts to about $30 worth of goods for each one of her 7,500,000 people. During the same year our imports from Canada were $95,128,310, about $1 for each of our 95,000,000 people. The Canadians purchased from us $30 worth of goods per capita, and we purchased from them $1 per capita.

The most cordial relations exist between the two peoples. There is no crying demand for a change on the part of the Canadians. They firmly adhere to a protective tariff upon manufactured articles and are careful not to change that policy in this trade agreement. Of present trade conditions we certainly can not complain. In 1910 Canada's trade with the United States was $53,000,000 more than with Great Britain; in 1909 our sales to Canada were $192,661,000 and Great Britain's sales to her were only $86,257,000, notwithstanding she gives the mother country a preferential tariff rate 33⅓ per cent below the rate imposed against us. She is our third best customer, and if cotton were eliminated she would rank second. She is growing and prosperous and exceedingly friendly. She insists upon a tariff wall against us, to protect her growing manufacturing interests, and without resentment we cheerfully recognize her right to do so. We shall not quarrel with her because she refuses to change her protective policy for the sole purpose of "cementing friendly relations" with us.

If we could have a reciprocal treaty with Canada under which trade in the products of each country would flow back and forth between the two as freely as it does now between the great States of Pennsylvania and New York, it may be that it would be a good thing for both countries, considering the situation and cost of production in each, and that each "would find in loss a gain to match"; but Canada herself makes that impossible. It is her firmly adopted policy to build up her own manufacturing industries under a protective tariff, and we can not persuade her to change that policy. The proposed trade agreement is the limit beyond which she will not go on her side. If we enact this law as proposed, without amendment, it will give to Canada free admission into the markets of the United States for her farm products without a sufficient "quid pro quo" to our people as a whole.

She will have secured what she wants without giving up anything in return. Having obtained that, she will not advance one step nearer.

So we must face this proposed law as the limit beyond which she will firmly decline to pass, unless we insist upon amending it now.

The main question for us to decide, then, is: Shall we accept this bill unchanged and admit the farm products of Canada into the United States free of duty, leaving a duty upon what the President calls "secondary food products, or foodstuffs partly manufactured"; a tariff to remain on lumber, except rough boards, and each of the Canadian Provinces reserving the right to impose export duties on wood pulp, pulp wood, and news print paper; a tariff to remain on manufactured products generally when imported by one of the countries from the other?

Mr. President, I can not give my assent to this proposal, because, in the first place, I do not believe it will promote the general welfare of the people of the United States; in the second place, it will, in my judgment, do irreparable harm to agriculture, which is our greatest industry.

The proposed law is, in effect, a declaration that we intend no longer to depend upon the cultivation of our own soil and the industry of the American farmer for our food supplies, and that agriculture in the United States is no longer to hold its imperial place at the head of our great industries, but is henceforth to be treated as a pursuit of lesser importance among American people, because from this time on we shall look beyond these American farms into foreign lands and we shall invite the whole world, upon equal terms, to compete with the American farmer in his own market place. In the third place, the law, as proposed, gives an unfair advantage to and an unjust discrimination in favor of certain trusts in the United States without giving any relief to the consumer from the burden of the cost of living, against which he bitterly complains.

The policy of this legislation is to recognize the people of the United States, not as a people engaged in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, with the dominating influence in agricultural pursuits and in rural communities, but an urban people engaged in manufacturing and commercial pursuits, with its dominating and formative national tendencies in the great cities and congested centers; a people who shun the country as a place of solitude and loneliness and the tiller of the soil as a vanishing type, who will disappear from the land in a few more generations. This proposed law not only recognizes this tendency, but will accentuate it ten thousand fold.

Mr. President, we are seemingly unaware of the remarkable influx of humanity that is swiftly changing the entire current of our national life. What a vast difference between the conditions which prevail in a farming community in the West, several hundred miles distant from a city, and the conditions of life in the East Side, in the Bronx, or in lower Manhattan, in the great city of New York.

I have examined with great interest the report of the New York City commission on "Congestion of population," made on the 28th day of February last, in which it quotes the following, written in 1905 by Mr. Lawrence Veiller, a well-known housing expert:

> No conception of the existing conditions can be obtained from any general statements. To say that the lower East Side of New York is the most densely populated spot in the habitable globe gives no adequate idea of the real conditions. To say that in one section of the city the density of the population is 1,000 to the acre; and that the greatest density of population in the most densely populated part of Bombay is but 759 to the acre; in Prague, 485 to the acre; in Paris, 434; in London, 365; in Glasgow, 350; in Calcutta, 204, gives one no adequate realization of the state of affairs. No more does it to say that in many city blocks on the East Side there is often a population of from 2,000 to 3,000 persons, a population equal to that of a good-sized village.

The only way that one can understand the real conditions is to go down into the streets of these districts and see the thousands of persons thronging there and making them impassable. So congested have become the conditions of some of the quarters of this city that it is not an exaggeration to say that there are more people living there than the land or the atmosphere can safely sustain. The limits have not only been reached, but have long been passed.

The New York City commission to which I have referred also quotes the following from a book published last year by Mr. Veiller, called "The housing problem," in which the author charges that—

The conditions of New York are without parallel in the civilized world. In no city in Europe, not in Naples nor in Rome, neither in London nor in Paris, neither in Berlin nor Budapest, not in Constantinople nor in St. Petersburg, not in ancient Edinburgh nor modern Glasgow, not in heathen Canton nor Bombay are to be found such conditions as prevail in modern, enlightened, twentieth-century, Christian New York.

In no other city is the mass of the working population housed as it is in New York, in tall tenement houses extending up into the air 50 or 60 feet and stretching for miles in every direction as far as the eye can reach.

In no other city are there the same appalling conditions with regard to lack of light and air in the homes of the poor. In no other city is there so great congestion and overcrowding. In no other city do the poor so suffer from excessive rents. In no other city are the conditions of city life so complex. Nowhere are the evils of modern life so varied. Nowhere are the problems so difficult of solution.

This commission, appointed under the administration of Mayor Gaynor, reports that the congestion so scathingly arraigned by Mr. Veiller in 1905 is growing worse and is still increasing in the sections of the city which had even in that year the greatest density of population per acre. While the commission was preparing its report, a building of 55 stories was planned for lower Manhattan, and yet the commission reports that in a six-story tenement, under existing laws, it is possible that only one room out of four will obtain an adequate supply of sunshine, and that it is possible to cover an entire plot of land adjacent to such a tenement house by a factory or warehouse of almost any height; that in this way a tenement house may be deprived not only of light, but of ventilation, for the yards or shafts become closed ducts. It reports that in certain blocks in the Borough of Manhattan no thorough ventilation can be had by reason of the fact that these various buildings surround the tenement house. The congestion is growing worse. In the block in Manhattan bounded by Grand, Broome, Ridge, and Pitt Streets the population increased from 1,845 to 2,552 from 1905 to 1910, an increase in that one block of 709. In that district there was an increase from 910 per acre to 1,260 per acre. The commission goes on to say:

A study of the changes in density of population from 1905 to 1910 of 28 important blocks in the lower part of the Bronx which had in 1905 a population of 1,000 or over is even more significant, because near many of these blocks are others practically unimproved, and within walking distance of some are scores of acres of vacant lands.

In these crowded tenements parents, children, and from three to eight adult boarders are often found occupying apartments of two, three, and four rooms.

In 122 blocks in Manhattan, which in 1905 had a density of over 750 people per acre, 65 per cent were foreign born, the Italians and Russians predominating. In 1905 the foreign-born population of Manhattan Borough was 890,142, and 23 per cent of these were domiciled in blocks having a density of over 750 per acre, while only 9 per cent of American-born people were living under like conditions. South of Fourteenth Street, on the East Side, the native-born population from 1900 to 1905 increased less than 4 per cent, while the foreign born increased nearly 20 per cent. There were many other districts where the number of native born in 1905 was actually less than in 1900. The tenement house commissioners report that to provide a good standard of housing for unskilled wage earners in New York City the maximum value of the land occupied by a tenement should not exceed 50 cents per square foot, but that in 1908 the assessed value of land per square foot occupied by the congested blocks of lower Manhattan ranged from $2.74 to $16, and in most of these blocks exceeded $10 per square foot. They find that a large part of the juvenile delinquencies, which are so serious in these congested districts, is directly traceable to the congested conditions of population among a large portion of the families from which the delinquents come.

Mr. Ernest K. Coulter, clerk of the children's court of New York County, told the commissioners that congestion is responsible for a vast number of the cases that come into the children's court of New York City. He said:

Environment counts nine-tenths in the whole proposition of juvenile delinquency.

He gave many instances of the results of room overcrowding, and claimed that children often come to feel that they are not wanted in their so-called homes, and that they are really forced to the streets. He says that the most skillful pickpockets in New York City are children from these places, and that their ranks are constantly being recruited from the districts where there is the greatest congestion.

Hon. William McAdoo, chief city magistrate, gave the following as his observation:

I think there can be no question but what the connection between congestion of population, especially in that form which it takes in the tenement houses, and crime and delinquency is very marked.

The crowded living conditions in these small rooms, lack of personal privacy, and separation of the sexes must, in the very nature of things, beget conditions which conduce to immorality and the lack of self-respect. I think that the poor family in the country, however impoverished, has a much better chance of bringing up the children to lead clean moral lives and be less sophisticated as to vice than children brought up in the congested quarters of the city. For instance, said he, I recently visited what are called the "agricultural slums" in the congested districts of Ireland, in a mountainous and very healthy country, where the indoor life is cramped and poverty obvious, but where the outdoor life is very healthful and the climate moderate and even and the moral and religious atmosphere excellent; and I should hesitate, if it had been left to me to transplant these people to the crowded tenements of the East Side, even if they got more food and better clothing than they did in the old country. The percentage of crime amongst these people in the old land is so low as to be scarcely perceptible, and they lead clean, moral lives, stimulated under adverse conditions by high spiritual exaltation and deep reverence.

The tenement commissioners find that one of the principal causes of this congestion is poverty; another, lack of control over aliens and citizens; another, high price of land in the city.

Shall we now accentuate the evil by adopting a national policy of discrimination against the American farm, thus encouraging the tendency to smother the life of our race in these congested centers?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If the people of New York City are in the desperate condition pictured, does the Senator think that we can aid them by increasing the price of farm products by taxation?

Mr. CRAWFORD. We certainly can stop country people from flocking to the cities if we make it possible for them to make a living on their farms. I shall later elaborate on that a little further.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say that those people were nearly all coming, not from farms in the Dakotas and Iowa, but from foreign countries.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In those particular localities. I do not wish the Senator to understand me that that is a situation which would apply, so far as the farm element is concerned, to all cities, his own, for instance. I shall, as I proceed, make that clear.

The positive menace this abnormal congestion of our population is to the public welfare was the subject of a conference held in New York in 1908. The little group of humanitarians who had been fighting bad housing, tuberculosis, insufficient schools, dearth of parks and playgrounds, ill health, accidents, and juvenile crimes concluded that the only cure for the evils of congestion is the abolition of congestion. A writer, giving an account of that meeting in the Charities and the Commons of April 4, 1908, says:

Within 19 miles of City Hall a population numbering 5,404,638 human souls lives and works. If the increase continues at the same pace as during the last 50 years, there will reside in Greater New York alone, in the year 1950, 25,000,000 souls. Such figures would be appalling enough if the population were distributed over the whole city area, but it is packed upon a small part of the area. Eleven New York blocks have a density of 1,200 per acre, which means that if the whole of little Delaware were similarly crowded it could contain the entire population of the world—white, black, yellow, and red.

But these conditions are not confined to New York City. In Charities and the Commons for May 9, 1908, Jacob A. Riis writes thus about the city of St. Louis:

Hear the report of the housing committee of the Civic League just made. It deals with that district between Seventh and Fourteenth Streets, Lucas Avenue, and O'Fallon Streets, comprising 48 blocks, where the poor live in neglected rear tenements, sometimes two, and in one case three, upon the same lot beside the front of the house. The lower rooms of these houses might, for all the sunlight they receive, be at the bottom of a well. Dilapidation, misery, and dirt reach their depths in the rear buildings. People who live in them are poorer, more sickly, less cleanly, and generally of a lower standard in every way.

Mr. President, I could go on indefinitely and present similar pictures showing similar conditions of congestion in Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and other American cities, but I have presented enough to call attention to what, it appears to me, is most unwise in this proposed change in our national attitude toward the American farmer, and that is this:

It will inevitably accentuate the tendency to leave the country and crowd into these cities, which are already too large, and it will depress and discourage the farming industry of the United States. Why was it necessary to raise any question of doubt on the part of the Government as to the ability of the American farmer to supply the domestic demands of his own country for farm products, and why was it necessary to create in his mind an apprehension that his occupation will be attended in the future with greater risk and uncertainty than before, because his competitors, living in another land and giving adhesion to another flag, are invited by his Government to bring the competing products of their soils into this market which he has created, and, without the payment of even a duty for revenue, allowed to compete against him in the land of his own domicile?

The Agricultural Yearbook for 1909 shows a condition of agriculture in the United States that should not be threatened by the passage of this proposed Canadian free trade in farm products. In it we are told by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, that—

> The value of the farm products is so incomprehensibly large that it has become merely a row of figures. For this year it is $8,760,000,000; the gain of this year over the preceding year is $869,000,000. Ten years ago the value of the product of the farm was only five and one-half times the mere gain of this year over 1908; it was little more than one-half of the total value of this year. It has advanced year by year during the last 11 years. It has paid off mortgages; it has established banks; it has made better homes; it has helped to make the farmer a citizen of the world; it has provided him with means for improving his soil and making it more productive.

There is no evidence in this Yearbook that the farms of the United States are rapidly approaching a time when they will not be able to provide enough food products to meet the demands of our own people or when we shall be obliged to go into the markets of the world to buy our bread and meat.

The corn crop this year was greater than the average crop of the five preceding years by 3½ per cent. We raised 2,767,000,000 bushels of corn in 1909. We had the largest wheat crop in six years with two exceptions. We raised a crop of 725,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1909. We raised 64,000,000 tons of hay, nearly 3 per cent more than the average for the five preceding years; 984,000,000 bushels of oats, 12 per cent more than the average of the five preceding years; 165,000,000 bushels of barley, 6 per cent more than the average of the five preceding years; 367,000,000 bushels of potatoes, 24 per cent more than the average of the five preceding years; also 25,767,000 bushels of flaxseed and 31,000,000 bushels of rye, which was a full average yield in each case.

The total crop of all cereals was 9,711,000,000 bushels in 1909, which was 6½ per cent higher than the average of the preceding five years. Production is not falling off, but increasing. The values both of the farms and their products are substantial and are based upon the natural law of supply and demand. Each farmer is an independent unit. He possesses no wealth created out of monopoly or by issuing watered stock. He is not a part of any combination in restraint of trade. He is not in a trust. He is one among about 12,000,000 others in the United States, constituting more than one-third of the 35,000,000 men engaged in so-called gainful occupations, but he is in no labor union. He is a creator of wealth and a builder of homes. Once only has he combined with others of his class to secure a fair price for his product. The Kentucky tobacco farmer did that. He combined to defend himself against the oppression of the Tobacco Trust. It is said that the grower of a certain kind of tobacco, who had been obliged to sell his crop for 7 cents a pound, found that the trust used it in manufacturing what was known as Star Plug, and when this farmer sought to buy Star Plug he had to pay 60 cents a pound for it. Where was the difference? It was due to the sins of monopoly and overcapitalization. So these tobacco farmers took notice of the Tobacco Trust. He became a night rider. This wide difference in price was the profits on the water in the trust stocks. He found that out. But, Mr. President, the enormous wealth which the farmer has created is without any of this alloy. He has never yet failed to supply the people of his own country with food. There is no ground for fear that he can not continue to do so for many, many years to come, unless his own Government by unjust discrimination disheartens him and destroys the incentive that has been his inspiration in all the struggles of past years.

Mr. James J. Hill, who is just now working for the Great Northern Railroad Co. rather than the American farmer, and who is a deep student of scientific methods of agriculture, says:

> An industrious, fairly intelligent, and exceedingly comfortable agricultural community can raise from the soil food enough for the needs of 490 persons to the square mile. Adopting that ratio, the 414,498,487 acres of improved lands in the United States on the date of the last official record—an area materially enlarged by the present time—would support in comfort 317,350,405 people, enabling them at the same time to raise considerable food for export and to engage in necessary manufacturing employments.

But this will never come to pass if the bars are to be thrown down and the doctrine of laissez-faire followed as to the American farmer alone. Unrestrained competition with foreign peoples will tempt our farmer to follow the lines of least resistance and to reap what he can for the day's needs only.

Such a policy holds out to him no hope for the future.

It will increase the number of abandoned farms, encourage soil waste and neglect, and mark the beginning of the end of the American farmer in many lines of food production.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator whether abandoned farms have not been brought about under the system of Republican high protection? Previous to Republican high protection, did we ever hear of abandoned farms? Yet throughout New England—not in the far Dakotas, but throughout New England—farm after farm is to-day abandoned under the iniquitous system of your so-called high protection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator from New Jersey will be patient, I will discuss that, and I will show that under the present tariff on farm products and under present conditions, whatever abuses there may be, there has been a falling off in the number of abandoned farms even in New England, and we want to let the progress we are now making go on.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That has been largely due to immigration and not to the iniquitous system that has burdened the farmer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not agree with the Senator in his claim that it is because of immigration. It is because farming has become profitable, and as long as farming can be kept profitable the number of your abandoned farms will continue to decrease.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. One moment. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota a question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask under what administration and what public policy this horrid system of congestion takes place in the great city of New York.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is one of the——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask under what system and under what administrative policy this horrid condition that is pictured in the eloquent address of the Senator took place? Was it under Republican policy or some other policy? Answer, please; answer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We had in my recollection, as young as I am, about four years of Democratic rule, and I do not remember that the conditions were alleviated one particle during that period.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. You have not alleviated them in 10 times four years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I say this will never come to pass if the bars are thrown down and the products of the alien farmers admitted upon an equal basis with our own. Speaking of abandoned farms, Secretary Wilson, in the Yearbook for 1909, says:

> The United States has been developing for agricultural purposes an area as large as the whole of Europe, while its population is but little larger than that of any of the several European countries.
> So much has fashion and sentiment had to do with this agricultural development that many of the lands, particularly in the Eastern States, have been practically abandoned, so far as profitable agricultural use is concerned, by the shifting and moving of our agricultural population into new regions in which lands are purported to be cheaper and in which the advertised inducements have been proportionately large. With the rapid extension also of our industrial life and the opportunities offered in the past in business and in the professions, the cities have called upon the country for clear brains and vigorous bodies to such an extent that large areas have become so depopulated of active, vigorous minds and bodies that the stock is insufficient to repeople the country districts. The result is that some of the most fertile lands in our Eastern States, some of the most fertile lands in the world, have been left in a condition of practical, if not actual abandonment, and the prices of provisions have increased for the simple reason that there are not enough people to actually work the soils and raise the crops necessary to feed the nonproducing population of the cities. The great problem which faces American agriculture to-day is the problem of the proper utilization of our soils and the development of our agricultural interests in spite of and in face of the allurements of the cities and the commercial and industrial avocations. It has now become as serious a problem to settle up our Eastern States as it has been in the past to settle the West. The first problem of all is to devise means of resettling the lands which have in recent years been neglected through the mistaken idea that they have been exhausted, but which can be brought back to an increasing production through a change in farm management and the infusion of new and active blood into the rural communities.

I think every patriotic citizen of the United States will readily assent to what Secretary Wilson says; but is it not very inconsistent, in face of the conditions he describes, to enter upon a national policy that will make these abandoned lands less attractive and that will accelerate emigration out of our own country and give new and increased value to farm lands beyond our borders? We have heard much in recent years about the conservation of our natural resources. In 1908, while I was governor of the State I now have the honor in part to represent, I attended a notable conference of the governors of the States of the Union, which met upon the invitation of the President, who at that time was Mr. Roosevelt. In a most remarkable address delivered at that conference Mr. James J. Hill discussed the necessity of conserving our soils. He said:

There are two ways in which the productive power of the earth is lessened: First, by erosion and the sweeping away of the fertile surface into streams and thence to the sea; and, second, by exhaustion through wrong methods of cultivation. The former process has gone far. Thousands of acres in the East and South have been made unfit for tillage. Far more ruinous is the process of soil exhaustion. It is creeping over the land from East to West. The abandoned farms that are now the playthings of the cities' rich, or the game preserves of the patrons of sport, bear witness to the melancholy change. New Hampshire, Vermont, northern New York show long lists of them. * * * When prices of farms should rise by increase of population in many cases they are falling. Between 1880 and 1900 the land values of Ohio shrank $60,000,000. Official investigation of two counties in central New York disclosed a condition of agricultural decay. In one land was for sale for about the cost of improvement, and 150 vacant houses were counted in a limited area. In the other population in 1905 was nearly 4,000 less than it was in 1855.

And, yet, he continues:

We might expand our resources and add billions of dollars to our national wealth by conserving soil resources * * * for there is good authority for the assertion that a farmer could take more from the same area of ground in four years' grain crop than seven now gives him, leaving the product of the other three years, when the land rested from grain, as a clear profit due to better methods. * * * Nearly 36 per cent of our people are engaged directly in agriculture; but all the rest depend upon it. In the last analysis commerce, manufactures, our home market, every form of activity, run back to the bounty of the earth by which every worker, skilled and unskilled, must be fed and by which his wages are ultimately paid. * * * Of our farm area only one-half is improved. It does not produce one-half of what it could be made to yield—not by some complex system of intensive culture, but merely by ordinary care and industry intelligently applied.

Placing the farmer of the United States upon a free-trade basis, so far as the vast and undeveloped empire of Canada is concerned, while leaving him no choice in the purchase of manufactured products, except to buy them in a protected market, will not help this situation. It will make a bad matter far worse, which, on the other hand, is rapidly curing itself. The American farmer has slowly forced his way across a vast continent. Each generation has opened a new empire of virgin soil which has, in a way, become a competitor of the older section of which it became an offshoot, but the process has gone on under full and complete free-trade relations between the States embracing all subjects of interstate commerce, and the new country has been formed into States, from time to time coming into the Union, being a part of the same people, owing allegiance to one Nation, all contributing alike to its support. In time the advantages and disadvantages have balanced each other; a loss in one thing has been offset by gain in another. During the past 10 years agriculture has been improving in the East as well as in the West, and land values have been moving upward there as elsewhere. Why should this splendid advance be now disturbed by an unfair proposal of the Canadian farmer, who assumes no burden of this Government, but owes allegiance to another, which refuses to abandon the protective tariff upon those manufactured articles which the American farmer does not sell but which he is obliged to buy?

Mr. Mark A. Carleton, who has been in charge of grain investigation in the Bureau of Plant Industry, calls attention to the fact that the total land area of the United States is nearly 2,000,000,000 acres. In 1900 less than half of this area was included in farms, only about one-fifth of the farm area was improved, and of the area improved less than 3 per cent was devoted to wheat culture. In 1850 our total improved farm acreage was 113,032,614 acres; in 1900, 414,498,487 acres. In 1866 our total acreage of wheat was 15,424,496 acres; in 1900, 41,971,000 acres, only 4 per cent of our total farm acreage. As a matter of fact, Mr. Carleton says the yield of wheat per acre in the United States is not decreasing, but has, on the contrary, increased. He gives 10-year averages of yield per acre in this country, from 1866 to 1905, as follows:

	Bushels.
1896–1905	13.5

At the same time he shows that the consumption of wheat by our people per capita has been materially increasing, as follows:

	Bushels.

He shows that we have sufficient land adapted to wheat raising for all our domestic needs for 50 years to come; that we have at least 80,000,000 acres of farm land adapted to this purpose.

Let American farmers be encouraged to cultivate this wheat land and raise this wheat. It will not increase the price of bread, but it will strengthen our rural population and increase the prosperity of the American farmer. Germany protects her agriculture. England maintains free trade in farm products. James J. Hill, in his book, Highways of Progress, thus compares the two countries:

How to meet German competition is to-day the study of every intelligent leader of industry and every cabinet on the Continent of Europe. * * * Agricultural industry has not been slighted. Behold a contrast that throws light upon the idle host of England's unemployed, marching despondently through the streets whose shop windows are crowded with wares of German make. Between 1875 and 1900, in Great Britain, 2,691,428 acres, which were under cereals, and 755,255 acres which were under green crops, went out of cultivation. In Germany during the same period the cultivated area grew from 22,840,950 to 23,971,573 hectares, an increase of 5 per cent.

Mr. Hill also significantly remarks:

Agriculture in England has suffered in the last 25 years by the opening of new land in America and the cheapening of the world's transportation.

And our new Tariff Board, as one of the results of its recent investigation of land values in Canada, makes the following comment (p. 84) in regard to the value of farm lands in Ontario:

Ontario, while reporting the highest Canadian land value, shows the lowest Canadian rate of increase. It is worthy to note that Ontario is feeling the competition of western Canada, just as some years ago the eastern part of the United States felt the competition of our western lands.

This process of restoring worn-out lands and maintaining the productivity of the soil involves a vast expenditure each year for fertilizers. The Canadian farmer, sowing spring wheat upon the virgin soil in Alberta and Saskatchewan, can raise a good yield without using any fertilizers at all.

According to the report of the Tariff Board (p. 94), the average yield of spring wheat per acre in 1910 in the United States was 11.7 bushels; in Canada, 15.53 bushels. Of winter wheat the yield per acre was 15.8 bushels; in Canada, 23.49 bushels. A much heavier yield per acre in Canada upon much cheaper priced land. Besides I find from the advance sheets of the census of 1910, covering 29 States and the District of Columbia, being Northern and New England and Western States, but including also Maryland and West Virginia—and all being States which raise either spring or winter wheat—that these States in 1900 paid $26,062,000 for fertilizers and in 1910 $40,409,000 for fertilizers, an increase in that item of expense alone of 51 per cent.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me a word here?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes. I do not care for extended remarks, though.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I shall not make any. But fertilizer, of which the Senator speaks, is a prime necessity in this country and growing more and more so each year. Then I ask, if the Senator's heart beats so fondly for the farmer, Why is it that in your tariff scheme you have not relieved fertilizer from the iniquitous tax which is a burden? Kainit, German salts, which is the basis of fertilizer, and the other fertilizers——

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am afraid the Senator from New Jersey is making a speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. And the other fertilizers that are controlled by the great Standard Oil Co. are all on the tariff list. So, if the Senator believes that which he speaks, lift the burden and let us have that fertilizer free, so that we need not ask odds of Canada or any other country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As to my sincerity, I can not help the Senator's incredulity, but this very much accursed Payne tariff law did take the tariff off of sulphate of ammonia, and our southern brethren were all demanding it, because it went into fertilizer. We did something, after all.

In 1900 these States paid the sum of $245,413,000 cash for labor upon farms, and in 1910 $432,481,000, an increase of 76 per cent. During these 10 years the number of farms in Colorado increased 86 per cent; Idaho, 76 per cent; Montana, 94 per cent; Nevada, 22 per cent; North Dakota, 64 per cent; Oregon, 26 per cent; South Dakota, 47 per cent; Washington, 68 per cent; Nebraska, 6 per cent; Kansas, 2 per cent, while there was a slight decrease in the number of farms in Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Ohio, and a slight increase in Maine, Maryland, and West Virginia. The average increase in the number of farms in the United States during the period is 13.5 per cent.

The cash value of the agricultural implements upon the farms in this great group of States was $556,035,000 in 1900, and in 1910 it was $938,902,000, an increase of 50.7 per cent. There was a substantial increase in the value of the farming implements on the farms in each of these States. As great as 217 per cent in Idaho, 212 per cent in North Dakota, 187 per cent in Montana, 176 per cent in South Dakota, 166 per cent in Washington, 81 per cent in Wisconsin, 78 per cent in Missouri, 74 per cent in Minnesota, 65 per cent in Iowa, 73 per cent in Michigan, 77 per cent in Nebraska, 64 per cent in Kansas, 62 per cent in Ohio, 39 per cent in Pennsylvania, and 49 per cent in New York. And all these implements came from the highly protected manufactories of the United States. Besides opening up new farms, paying out millions and millions of dollars for fertilizers, and for farm labor, and for farm implements, the American farmer during the past 10 years has been erecting new farm buildings and improving the old ones.

The census returns just out for 1910 show an enormous increase in the value of buildings on the farms in this group of States during the 10 years from 1900 to 1910. In Colorado that increase was 183 per cent; in Connecticut, 45 per cent; in Idaho, 267 per cent; in Illinois, 71 per cent; in Indiana, 89 per cent; in Iowa, 89 per cent; in Kansas, 79 per cent; in Maine, 54 per cent; in Maryland, 42 per cent; in Massachusetts, 22 per cent; in Michigan, 79 per cent; in Minnesota, 120 per cent; in Missouri, 81 per cent; in Montana, 164 per cent; in Nebraska, 118 per cent; in New Hampshire, 23 per cent; in New York, 40 per cent; in North Dakota, 262 per cent; in Oregon, 127 per cent; in Pennsylvania, 26 per cent; in Rhode Island, 30 per cent; in South Dakota, 231 per cent; in Vermont, 45 per cent; in West Virginia, 67 per cent; in Wisconsin, 85 per cent; in Washington, 233 per cent; in Ohio, 67 per cent.

There has been a remarkable increase in the value of farm lands in the United States, and it has not been confined to any locality. It has occurred in New England and the East as well as in the Central West and Northwest. This increase indicates that the attention of the people is turning again to the country and to farm lands.

Mr. President, how fatal would be the mistake should we now check this tendency to "go back to the American farm" by inviting an era of free trade in farm products with Canada. During the 10 years from 1900 to 1910, according to the census returns for 29 States, the total value of farm land alone increased as follows:

Colorado, 300 per cent; Idaho, 518 per cent; Illinois, 106 per cent; Connecticut, 36 per cent; Indiana, 93 per cent; Iowa, 122 per cent; Kansas, 188 per cent; Maine, 74 per cent; Maryland, 35 per cent; Massachusetts, 32 per cent; Michigan, 45 per cent; Minnesota, 82 per cent; Missouri, 104 per cent; Montana, 394 per cent; Nebraska, 231 per cent; Nevada, 163 per cent; New Hampshire, 25 per cent; New Jersey, 31 per cent; New York, 28 per cent; North Dakota, 321 per cent; Oregon, 262 per cent; Pennsylvania, 9 per cent; Rhode Island, 11 per cent; South Dakota, 376 per cent; Vermont, 27 per cent; West Virginia, 53 per cent; Wisconsin, 71 per cent; Washington, 419 per cent; Ohio, 57 per cent.

But should we have free trade in farm products with Canada, our chief rival in the production of cereal grains would be the farmers of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, and we would be at a disadvantage.

Land in Wisconsin worth $57 per acre, in Michigan worth $46 per acre, in Iowa worth $109 per acre, in Minnesota worth $46 per acre, in North and South Dakota worth $40 per acre, yielding an average of 11.7 bushels of spring wheat to the acre and 15.8 bushels of winter wheat to the acre, must compete with land in Manitoba worth $29 per acre, in Saskatchewan worth $22 per acre, in Alberta worth $20 per acre, yielding 15.53 bushels of spring wheat and 23.49 bushels of winter wheat per acre, with the barley average yield per acre 24.6 bushels in Canada and 22.4 bushels in the United States; flaxseed, 4.8 bushels in the United States and 7.97 bushels in Canada; oats, 31.9 bushels per acre in the United States and 32.79 bushels in Canada; hay, 1.33 tons per acre in the United States and 1.82 tons per acre in Canada; and the average yearly wage of farm hands in Canada $250 to $300, as against $300 to $360 per year in Minnesota and the Dakotas. With the tariff on farm products coming into this market from Canada entirely removed, the farmer in Iowa, who owns 160 acres of land worth $100 per acre, could sell it, take the $16,000, and buy 800 acres of land in Alberta—just five times the quantity he had before, each acre of which will yield more wheat, oats, barley, or flaxseed than an acre of Iowa land.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish the Senator would let me finish this sentence, so as not to have it broken in two, and then I will yield. I am speaking about the farms of the West, and I would like to have the Senator listen to it. I say the farmer in Iowa who owns 160 acres of land worth $100 per acre could sell it, take the $16,000, and buy 800 acres of land in Alberta—just five times the quantity he had before—each acre of which will yield more wheat, oats, barley, or flaxseed than an acre of Iowa land, or of Wisconsin, Minnesota, or Dakota land, as the case may be. Is it not perfectly plain that the result will be a depression in the values of Iowa, Dakota, Minnesota, and Wisconsin land and a great boom for the Canadian farmer at the expense of the American farmer?

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from South Dakota has just called attention to the fact that land in Iowa is worth $100 per acre and in South Dakota $46 per acre. I should like to ask him whether the growing of wheat in South Dakota on land worth $46 an acre has proved a disastrous competition to the growing of wheat in Iowa on land worth $100 an acre?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think so; but——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, I should like to ask the Senator how it is going to prove a disaster to this country to have Canadian wheat come in grown on their cheaper land, so that it will compete with the wheat grown on the land of Iowa or of South Dakota or of Nebraska, the price of which varies greatly?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator lives in the State of Nebraska and he certainly knows that in the State of Nebraska, in the State of Iowa, in the State of Illinois the chief product is corn—corn, cattle, and hogs—and those States do not come in contact with Canada as the Dakotas and Minnesota, because we are cereal-growing States while they are not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to say to the Senator that Nebraska grows many million dollars' worth of wheat every year and has not felt that the competition with South Dakota on her cheaper lands is at all disastrous. I want to say that wheat land in the United States varies enormously in value; that it varies more in value in the different States than the land in South Dakota varies from the land in Canada.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have discussed that. There is a self-adjustment, a give and take, a loss and gain, an equilibrium, and we are perfectly satisfied with it where we are all bearing the same burdens, giving allegiance to the same Government, acting in loyalty to the same system. It is true that it has many, many times depreciated the value of our lands. I remember when my people lived in central Ohio 30 years ago they thought their land was worth $100 an acre and it went down to $25 an acre, because they could not compete with the great empire of the West that developed as it did; but it afterwards regained its value; it was all in the United States, and adjusted itself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that at the very time the new State of Oklahoma was being opened to settlement hundreds of thousands of acres of land were being thrown into corn cultivation, and at the same time the corn land of Iowa and Nebraska and Kansas had their greatest advance in value and did not appear to suffer from that competition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I remember that they used to talk about burning corn for fuel in Iowa.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was before the days when Oklahoma was opened to corn cultivation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not prepared to question the Senator in that respect. If you throw the bars down, you are going to drop our price and you are going to raise theirs until they reach a level. There is no escape from that conclusion.

What is called the "farm price per bushel" of cereals by the Tariff Board was uniformly higher in 1910 in the United States than in Canada, as the following list shows:

The average yield of oats per acre in Canada in 1910 was 32.79 bushels. In the United States it was 31.9 bushels. Its farm value per bushel was 32 cents in Alberta, 28½ cents in Saskatchewan, 21 cents in Manitoba, and 36 cents in Ontario. Its farm price per bushel in Montana was 46 cents; North Dakota, 37 cents; Minnesota, 32 cents; Michigan, 35 cents; New York, 42 cents.

The barley farmer has received an object lesson in regard to the effect upon the price of his barley by removing the tariff from Canadian barley, which he will not soon forget.

The great barley Provinces of Canada are Ontario and Manitoba. The average yield in Ontario is 4 bushels above that of Wisconsin, 8 bushels above that of Minnesota, 1 bushel above that of New York, and less than 1 bushel above that of Iowa. The highest farm prices per bushel—77 cents and 76 cents—are reported from New Hampshire, Maine, and Nova Scotia. The lowest farm prices per bushel—36 cents, 38 cents, and 39 cents—are reported from Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba, respectively.

There are two well-defined barley-growing regions in Canada, Ontario and the eastern Provinces, and western Canada. Eastern Canada, including Ontario, has long been noted as one of the finest barley-growing regions in the world, and before the present duty was placed upon it large quantities of this Ontario barley were malted in the United States. But Ontario has steadily declined in the production of high-grade malting barley. Next to Ontario in importance as a barley-producing Province comes Manitoba, but for a number of years barley production in Manitoba has been practically stationary.

Since 1905 some barley has been grown farther to the west, in Saskatchewan and Alberta. The soil and climate of western Canada are so favorable that its barley is sold at a premium in English markets, but under present conditions greater profit is apparently found in other crops.

While their barley enterprise has been standing still our farmers have been making money out of it. Now you want to tear the bars down and give the benefit of it to whom? To the Brewers' Trust.

As shown by Table 15 in the report of the Tariff Board, page 99, Minnesota is the heaviest producer of barley near the Canadian border, her crop in 1910 being nearly 27,000,000 bushels. Wisconsin comes next with 22,429,000 bushels; South Dakota is third with 18,655,000 bushels; North Dakota is fourth with 15,045,000 bushels.

Of the Canadian Provinces, Ontario is the largest producer. In 1910 her total yield was 20,727,000 bushels. Manitoba came next with 13,826,000 bushels. The average yield per acre in the United States was 22.4 bushels; in Canada 24.62 bushels. In Ontario the farm price is 53 cents per bushel, and in Manitoba 39 cents per bushel. Notwithstanding the tariff shuts Canadian barley out of our market, the production of barley has increased in Canada. It appears from a table found on page 100 of the report of the Tariff Board that in 1900 all the Provinces in Canada produced 20,322,666 bushels, and in 1909 they produced 48,810,685 bushels. In 1910 the United States produced 162,227,000 bushels, while all the Provinces produced 45,147,600 bushels. Unusual drought in North Dakota and part of South Dakota explains why our crop for 1910 was less than for 1909. That was not a normal barley year. Previous to 1897 the rate of duty on barley was 30 per cent ad valorem. By the tariff law of 1897 this duty was increased to 30 cents per bushel. Under the old rate there were large importations of barley from Canada into the United States. In 1894 more than 2,000,000 bushels were imported. In 1897 over 1,000,000 bushels. But after the imposition of the flat duty of 30 cents per bushel importations ceased. In 1909 only 2,420 bushels were imported. Under the McKinley law, from October 1, 1890, to August 27, 1894, there was a duty on barley of 30 cents per bushel, the same as now.

In 1892, under this duty, the December price per bushel in Chicago ran from 65 cents to 67 cents. The May price for the same year was 65 cents.

In 1893 December barley in Chicago ran from 52 cents to 54 cents; May barley from 55 cents to 60 cents.

In 1894 December barley in Chicago ran from 52½ cents to 53½ cents, and May barley from 51 to 52 cents.

In 1894 the tariff on barley was materially reduced, from 30 cents per bushel to 30 per cent ad valorem; and in 1895 December barley in Chicago ran from 33 cents to 40 cents, and May barley from 25 cents to 26 cents.

In 1896 December barley ran from 22 cents to 37 cents, and May barley from 24½ cents to 35 cents.

In 1897 December barley ran from 25½ cents per bushel to 42 cents, and May barley from 36 cents to 53 cents.

Then, on July 24, 1897, the old rate of 30 cents per bushel was restored by the Dingley law, and has been continued in our present law, and the price of barley has steadily advanced, as shown by the following:

[Cents per bushel.]

Years.	December high and low price in Chicago.		May high and low price in Chicago.
	Low.	High.	Low.	High.
1902	36	70	48	56
1904	38	52	40	50

[1] Not given.

These figures are taken from Table 17, page 101, Report of the Tariff Board. This board also reports (p. 105) that—the price of barley in Canada is generally below the price of the United States. From 1900 to 1909 the Chicago price ranged from 1 cent to 46 cents above the Winnipeg price. Half of this time the difference was above 13 cents.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do, if the Senator wishes just to ask a question. I do not want to keep the Senate unduly long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota yields.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator hold that the passage of the tariff on barley raised the price of barley in this country?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. REED. Who pays ultimately that increased price?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The man who drinks the beer, I presume.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator hold that that is true of the tariff on all farm products?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not.

Mr. REED. You do not?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not. I will demonstrate it, if the Senator will permit me, right here, and we will save time. I am going into that quite fully, and I will demonstrate that the small tariff on this cereal as it leaves the farm is not a factor when you consider the loaf of bread. However, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] elaborated on that so completely and made it so plain that I do not think it will be necessary for me to spend much time on it. But when it comes to the loaf of bread, the difference is absolutely inconsequential.

Mr. REED. I do not want to pursue the matter further than to get clearly the Senator's view. As I understand it, if you increase the price of barley by a tariff, the man who drinks the beer pays the increased cost?

Mr. CRAWFORD. He will not in this case. If we pass this Canadian tariff it will not change the price of a glass of beer, but I will demonstrate before I get through that your Brewers' Trust and your distillers are getting something here that is an absolute outrage, when it comes to the American farmer, and you are giving it to them.

Mr. REED. I trust the Senator is not delivering over the Brewers' Trust to me.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope not.

Mr. REED. As my trust.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not wish you any harm.

Mr. REED. I wanted to pursue my question to a direct answer. I understand the Senator to say that the tariff upon barley increased the price which was ultimately paid by the man who drank the beer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think that would really be a disaster, but it may be true as a fact.

Mr. REED. If that is true then why will not an increase of the price of wheat ultimately be paid by the man who eats the bread?

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will do me the honor to remain here until I finish my remarks I will make it plain to him that the way this bill is presented to the Senate it leaves a tariff of 50 cents a barrel on flour while it takes the tariff off of wheat, and it will not decrease the price of bread a farthing, but it will give the manufacturers of flour an undue and unfair advantage at the expense of the American farmer. I will do that as to every item in this bill relating to farm products, but I do not care to be diverted at this part of my remarks to go into that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota declines to further yield.

Mr. REED. I will remain to hear the Senator, but I will remind him that we are furnishing a majority of the audience who are remaining to hear the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I do not take it up I will thank the Senator for calling my attention to it.

Speaking of hay, the Tariff Board says that Ontario, which produces more hay than New York, reports an average yield of 1.84 tons as against New York's average of 1.32 tons per acre. The highest American farm price—over $15 per ton—is reported from New Hampshire and from Wisconsin. The highest Canadian price, $14.58, is that quoted for Alberta. The Ontario price is $10.21 per ton as against the New York price of $13.70.

Flaxseed is a staple crop in several northwestern States near the Canadian border. In 1910, because of drouth, the yields in Minnesota and the Dakotas fell far below normal. But despite these low yields in 1910 South Dakota and Minnesota each produced nearly as much flaxseed as all Canada; North Dakota produced about 2,000,000 bushels more than Canada. Take the tariff off flaxseed and the situation will swiftly change. The yield of bushels per acre in 1910 was 11.79 bushels in Manitoba, 7.87 bushels in Saskatchewan, and 4.48 bushels in Alberta; 3.6 bushels in North Dakota, 5 bushels in South Dakota, 8 bushels in Nebraska, 7 bushels in Montana. The highest farm price was $2.40 per bushel in Montana; the lowest $2.10 in Kansas. In Canada the highest farm price per bushel was $2.08 in Saskatchewan, and the lowest $1.87 in Alberta. Prepared flaxseed is known as linseed, and the flaxseed crop is used by the Linseed Oil Trust in the United States.

Ontario and Quebec are great dairying Provinces. Quebec has an excellent local breed of dairy stock and Ontario is favorably situated and well equipped for the production of fine grades of dairy goods. The necessary foodstuffs are available and the skill of her dairymen is acknowledged. The Tariff Board reports that there are 856,151 milch cows in Quebec and 1,243,680 in Ontario, while Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont combined have 582,000; New York, 1,771,000; Michigan, nearly 1,000,000; Wisconsin, 1,500,000. It is true that east Canada is not equipped for raising and fattening beef because Indian corn is neither cheap nor abundant there; but Indian corn is not a factor of the first importance in the maintenance of dairy herds. What are known as mill feeds are much cheaper in Canada than in the United States. The prices of bran and middlings are constantly lower at Winnipeg than at Minneapolis; in Toronto the prices of these products are constantly lower than at Buffalo; also lower at Montreal than at Buffalo. The Tariff Board reports that on February 26 the price of bran in Winnipeg was $19 per ton and of middlings $20, while on the same day—thanks to the Millers' Trust—the Iowa farmers were paying $25 to $28 per ton for bran and $27 to $30 for middlings.

The great dairy countries of the world are Denmark, Belgium, Holland, Norway, and Russia. It is only in recent years that the American farmer has developed what is known as modern dairying. Last year the total export of cheese by all the countries of the world was 485,000,000 pounds, of which Canada exported 172,000,000 pounds, and the United States only 10,000,000 pounds. Canada also exports about 6,000,000 pounds of butter annually.

The American farmer and dairyman can not but feel that he is unjustly discriminated against by a proposal which will admit such a competitor into our home market without the imposition of any import duty whatever. The Dominion is looking after its farmers and their welfare. Why should the United States not remain loyal to all its citizens? Why discriminate against the farmer? The Provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba are building up dairying interests by subsidizing Government creameries. A farmer living at a distance from a creamery ships his cream by express, and the express charges are rebated. Consul General John E. Jones, of Winnepeg, reports that before the Government creamery was established there in 1908 dairy butter sold for 12½ cents per pound in trade; but that from July 1 to the end of October, since the opening of the creamery, the lowest price paid by the Government was 21½ cents per pound and the highest price was 31½ cents per pound for butter fat, payments made in cash twice a month.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from South Dakota has been talking for a long time. I know that he is far from well. I ask him if he would not prefer to continue to-morrow?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know but that almost an apology is due to the Senate, but I feel constrained to discuss this question at some length. It is a matter my constituents look at with tremendous seriousness, and I feel under the most profound obligation to do what I can to get this case squarely before the country for them. While I have not been very well, I have talked for a good while and I would appreciate it if I might go on to-morrow.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 18, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for every great soul who has climbed the heights, caught a vision, evolved a truth, made a discovery, invented a machine, a device, caused two blades of grass to grow where one grew, wrote a book, a poem, a song, painted a picture, carved a statue, reared an altar to his God, founded a hospital, a school, a college, or gave greater freedom of thought and action to mankind. So may it be our desire and our good fortune. And Thine be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday evening the matter before the House was the resolution (H. Res. 172) of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and the immediate matter was the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to refer that resolution to the Committee on Rules. The immediate matter is to take a vote on that motion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that it is not my wish to take snap judgment or to make any technical contention about the passage of the resolution now pending as introduced by me on yesterday, but there are a few plain statements I desire to make to the membership of this House in order that the case may be thoroughly understood. About a week ago the House adopted a resolution providing for the investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co., commonly known as the Sugar Trust. In that resolution there was a provision for the House to elect a committee of nine members. For satisfactory reasons the election of the committee has been postponed from the day of the adoption of the resolution until yesterday, when there was offered the resolution nominating the nine Members to constitute the committee, five from this side of the House and four from the other side. At the outset let me say that I assume all responsibility for nominating the five Members from this side of the House. I did not say yesterday, nor will I say to-day, that the Committee on Rules made the selection of the Democratic or the Republican members of the committee.

The Committee on Rules did not, neither did the Democratic nor the Republican membership, nor did any subcommittee of the Democrats or the Republicans, make the selections. Therefore I make the candid statement to the House that as a Representative from the eleventh congressional district of Texas, not as the chairman of the Committee on Rules, not as a member of the Committee on Rules, the responsibility of nominating these 10 Democratic Members should be charged against me.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I prefer not to yield until later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no concealment to make from the House or country. This is a great question concerniug the American people. It is no time to quibble over technicalities. The Committee on Rules, by a unanimous vote, reported two resolutions—one to investigate the United States Steel Corporation and the other to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co.—and provided that this House should elect the committees provided for in both those resolutions.

Gentlemen, discard the idea from your minds that this resolution providing for the election of these Members came from the Committee on Rules or from the Democratic Members, for it did not come from them, but it came from me as an individual Representative, and I consulted as freely as possible many of my brethren on this side of the House about the personnel of the committee. Obviously it was impossible for me to confer with every Democrat, but I did talk with as many as were accessible. And I realize that some men who should have been consulted were inadvertently overlooked. I always consult them when within easy reach of their ear. But, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] first introduced his resolution it provided that this select committee should be chosen by the Speaker, as all select and conference committees are selected. The resolution came to the Committee on Rules with a provision in it to the effect that the committee should be selected by the Speaker. Let me say to you, gentlemen, that the Speaker had a conference with me. and stated that for reasons satisfactory to himself he preferred the Committee on Rules should so amend the Stanley resolution and provide for the election by the House, and I yielded to his wishes.

I candidly state the facts to the House, and have no apologies to make for my course, because it leaves it to the body of the membership to elect the committees. If gentlemen are not satisfied with the names proposed, they can make suggestions, and we can change the names if the new ones are appropriate. We will give you a better committee, if one can be found in the House. Understand that the Speaker desired to be relieved of the responsibility for reasons satisfactory to himself, and, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, I concurred with him that we could afford to make the departure in this particular case, and it was accordingly and wisely made.

The Committee on Rules does not wish to arrogate to itself any authority, and is not reaching out for it. I am acting as an individual, and am simply deferring to the wishes of the Speaker. The resolution as adopted on yesterday, as finally introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, provides for the election by the House instead of appointment at the hands of the Speaker. The first resolution providing for the selection by the Speaker was House resolution 139, and read to this effect:

Resolved, That a committee of nine Members of this House, to be appointed by the Speaker, is hereby directed to make an investigation, etc.

Then when the matter came up the next time before the Committee on Rules we acquiesced in the wishes of the Speaker and changed the verbiage of the resolution which was reported to the House and adopted on yesterday and made it read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members to be elected by the House be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation, etc.

And the Sugar Trust investigation resolution is fashioned exactly after the Steel Trust resolution. Gentlemen, you have the case before you. I have no desire to rob the Democratic caucus of any rights or powers they have, and let me say to you when we are pressing forward on matters of great concern to the American people let us not halt and quibble over technicalities. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Up to the present time we have been harmonious, and I am glad to report to this side of the House, after a brief journey through certain sections of the country, we have the enthusiastic and unqualified approval of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I decline to yield for the present. Gentlemen, it makes but little difference whether or not I as an individual Member from the eleventh district of Texas can exercise the poor privilege of nominating these Members to the House. It is a small matter to me and of little importance whether this House votes me down as chairman of the Committee on Rules or as an individual. It is not important what may happen to me, and would amount to nothing if I should depart from the proceedings here and cease to be a Member, but it is of vital importance to the country that the Democrats stand together and press forward to redeem their pledges to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Reiterating, I take the responsibility for suggesting these names. If they are not satisfactory, we would be glad to have the suggestion of the gentlemen; we would be glad for them to submit names they prefer for the committee. Let me say as a Representative of my district and party, if I must be exposed to unjust criticism, I shall not hesitate to stand in this House before the American people and discuss some things as they should be discussed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I give warning to the gentlemen if they intend to discuss these things, they must reveal their motives and purposes and face me here and before the American people. [Applause.] It is of small moment whether you vote down these names submitted by me as an humble Member, but it does make a vast deal of difference as to what you shall do with this investigation and the personnel of the committee. They talk about referring the names back to the Committee on Rules. They do not come from the Committee on Rules; they come from an individual. If you refer them back to us, we shall not report them. Why should we? They have not been before us. Then you may take your own course.

If you go into a caucus, will you make any better selection than we have made? What is objectionable about this matter? Are any of you gentlemen dissatisfied with the personnel? If so, tell us about it and we will discuss it candidly and will make any change if it appears to be right. This committee is headed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and appropriately so, because he is the mover of the resolution, although he is a member of the Committee on Rules. And then we put upon it one more Member, an able gentleman, from the State of Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I suggested him because he is an able, upright, honorable, and capable Representative and a first-class lawyer, and we need him to grapple with the attorneys and talent that will be employed by the Sugar Trust and Steel Trust.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Not now; but in a moment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Just so as to make clear what the gentleman is saying. The gentleman from Texas makes the statement that he in his representative capacity as an individual Member proposed these names, but he is continually speaking of "we" doing this, or "we" making this change, and "we" believing something. Who are the "we" to whom the gentleman refers?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is only an editorial expression. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to be perfectly fair to the gentleman if he means that he himself would make——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman once and for all that "we" does not mean the Speaker of the House and myself, for the Speaker had nothing to do with making this committee, if that is what you are charging. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York has not intimated in any manner that the Speaker has had anything to do with it. I believe that if he had had it would have been satisfactory, but to be perfectly fair, when the gentleman from Texas speaks of "we" it is not fair to Members who have not been let into the secret as to who constitutes the "we."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am glad the gentleman has interrupted, and if it becomes necessary, which I hope will not be the case, I will make the expression "we" peculiarly appropriate when referring to some conferences held between some of the New York delegation and myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman that I am not aware of what he refers to. He had no conference with me. If he had conferred with me, anything I would have said to him he would be at perfect liberty to disclose to this House. [Applause.] I am not accustomed to making statements in private that I am unwilling to make on the floor of this House, if they refer to anything in the discharge of my duty.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am glad to confirm what the gentleman says, and to state that he and I had no conference about this matter, and am indeed grieved to think that he stands in the way of this investigation, or the personnel of the committee, for a single instant by criticizing the method of our selections.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not doing either, and when the gentleman will give me time, which I hope he will, I will make some statements to show it. But when the gentleman intimates in a colloquy with me that it may be necessary for him to disclose statements made between him and the members of the New York delegation, the only inference could be that I was involved in such conference, when neither directly nor indirectly has any such conference been held.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Dismiss that from your mind. I did not consult the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nor has anybody who consulted with me consulted with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I exonerate the gentleman. Now, Mr. Speaker, when I drew the gentleman into the matter and now exonerate him and say that he did not confer with me, directly or indirectly, that should suffice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not wish to have a personal controversy with the gentleman, but only one inference could be drawn from the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then I withdraw any statement that I have made that may be offensive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not offensive, because nothing offends me if it is accurate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that is true. The gentleman could not afford to be offended if it was accurate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no personal feeling and it will not humiliate me if gentlemen do not agree with me. But suppose the House were to refer these nominations back to the Committee on Rules. The matter has not been there, and the Committee on Rules can take no action about the personnel. Suppose you go to the caucus to select your membership. I have stated to the House candidly why we changed the verbiage of the resolution and relieved the Speaker of the responsibility and left the choice to the House. We will take no snap judgment. We will not move the previous question—perhaps I would better say "I," and not "we"—I will not move the previous question unless compelled to do so by some emergency. We shall have freedom of discussion and amendment, and if there is anybody who is not satisfied with the names in this resolution we will be glad to consider others and vote on them. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did I understand the gentleman to say just now that this matter had not been taken up and considered by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean the personnel of the committee?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I say yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this language used by him yesterday in debate:

> But, Mr. Speaker, when a majority of the Committee on Rules—aye, every member of the Committee on Rules, both Democrats and Republicans—agreed that this resolution should be adopted and the committee elected, I do not see the sense in submitting it to a caucus where we all agreed.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I meant the resolution by that. I was speaking in general terms. I believed, and still think, the Democrats could stand together and agree upon five members of this committee. Altogether there are 55 chairmen of committees, and we felt that we could not take many of them. We were limited in the selection of the personnel, because it was hard to find Members who are not already preoccupied.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, just a moment. The gentleman contends now that he meant to say yesterday and now says that he himself is responsible for these committee selections.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And I say now what I said yesterday.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That he—the gentleman from Texas—is responsible for these committee selections?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has repeatedly stated to this House and reiterated the statement that this is a matter of tremendous importance to the American people. Now, if it is a matter of such tremendous importance to the American people, does not the gentleman think that it is just a little important, the make-up and selection of this committee? Does the gentleman feel adequate in himself, out of 227 Democrats, to decide a matter of such tremendous importance to the people of the country?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; and the House is now electing, by its own will and act, the members of the committee. I merely suggested the names, and now suggest to the gentleman that if he is not satisfied with the personnel perhaps we can arrange it to suit him.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have not stated, Mr. Speaker, that I was not satisfied with the personnel of this committee. I do not know whether I am satisfied or not. I have not had an opportunity to consider the personnel of this committee. I do not know anything about the considerations or motives which may have influenced their selection. What I object to is the method by which the personnel of this committee has been decided upon.

The gentleman from Texas says these selections are open to amendment. The gentleman knows how futile that proposition is, and he also knows the utter uselessness of the mere form of going about and pulling a list out of his pocket and submitting it to this and that and the other Member and saying, "Is this list all right? Does it suit you?"

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I must object, Mr. Speaker, to yielding to the gentleman further.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I deny, Mr. Speaker, that such action is satisfactory to the membership of this body.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let us take a sensible view of it. When the Ways and Means Committee is to go into conference with the Senate on a great tariff bill, a great revenue measure, how are the conferees selected? Are they really, in fact, selected by the Speaker, as the rule provides shall be the case? Every intelligent Member knows that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee suggests those conferees. The same is true with respect to the great Appropriations Committee, headed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Frequently, and, I imagine, in almost every instance, the chairman of that committee suggests the conferees. So this matter is not as important as the gentleman would make it appear. Because, forsooth, I have nominated these names to the House for election, for your ratification, all this unseemly wrangle has occurred.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman has reiterated that he has made the selection. It obscures the issue when he says that if the membership of the committee is not satisfactory to the membership of the House, as suggested by him, they have a remedy. It is a very embarrassing remedy, and that is not the question. The question is the method of procedure in nominating this committee. Now, what did the gentleman from Texas on yesterday mean by this language? I read from page 1257 of the RECORD:

> Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, just a word. As chairman of the Committee on Rules, I desire to say that the responsibility was put on that committee. We have not arrogated to ourselves any authority. We understand how jealous, and rightly so, Members have been of their prerogatives as Representatives in this House. We are not trying to dictate to the Democracy or the membership of this House, but here was the responsibility coming up that could be solved by your committee. Now, how much better off would you be if you submitted it to some other committee and let them pass on it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Missouri is too good a lawyer to want to hold me to a strict technical construction of the language. When I made that statement I spoke the truth, and was speaking in general terms of the resolutions and make-up of the membership of the committee. The resolutions came from the Committee on Rules and somebody had to take the responsibility of suggesting names, and as an humble member I have done so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In view of that equivocal language I wished the gentleman to clear up the situation so that the House could know what he meant.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further. I do not admit that the language is equivocal or needs clearing up. I stand now as on yesterday.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. After the adoption of the resolution, which provides that the committee should be elected by the House, would not the ordinary course have been for the matter to be brought to the attention of the House by the chairman of the majority caucus in a motion to elect?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It would be in regard to the standing committees. Undoubtedly the gentleman is correct, but here is where we varied the rule in reference to the select committees.

Mr. KENDALL. What is the distinction between this committee and the standing committee which authorizes a private Member of the House to propose the names of the committee?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that can be made so plain that the gentleman will understand it. Of course, if it had been a standing committee the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would have made the nomination, but where we had a resolution under consideration, that changed the rule to a certain extent which provided that the Speaker should appoint the select and conference committees, and thus required the House to elect this committee, as it did the Ballinger-Pinchot committee, it was thought perhaps we could solve the problem if some Member in his individual capacity should suggest the names to the House of Representatives. If you go before the caucus, somebody must offer names to the caucus. If you come to the House, some one must present them here. We suggested the names of the Members to investigate the Steel Trust and not a murmur to the proceeding was heard. They were elected by unanimous vote; but all of a sudden some gentleman concludes that he has been overlooked and becomes antagonistic.

I regret not being able to confer with every Democratic Member, and again repeat that those who believe they can select a better committee by committing it to the Rules Committee, where it will sleep if you do it, or those who think it should be presented to a Democratic caucus, can vote this resolution down. And you will see how much better it will be and whether this controversy will avail anything. You are not making any better progress.

So far as I am concerned, it will not embarrass me whatever you do, for, in my individual capacity, I intend to keep faith with the American people, and, if it lies within my power, to maintain harmony in the Democratic Party, going forward to that greater victory awaiting us in 1912. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, but first will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] for a question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. How much time has the gentleman from Texas remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 25 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas occupied a half or three-quarters of an hour yesterday. Is he now, in taking the floor, entitled to another hour because it is a different day?

The SPEAKER. Not because it is a different day, but because it is a different proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest this, that before adjournment last evening the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yielded the floor for a motion to commit this resolution, but taking the floor this morning he is entitled to an hour, nobody having protested his right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is correct.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but does the Chair rule now that if the gentleman from Texas again yields the floor to other gentlemen, he can then take the floor and be entitled to another hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules this, that the original proposition which started this debate was the resolution nominating nine members of this committee, and the gentleman from Texas had an hour. Just about the time that hour was expiring the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] made a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] raised the point of no quorum. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] then moved that the House adjourn, and the House did adjourn. So that the matter which came up first was the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to refer this original resolution to the Commitee on Rules, and the gentleman from Texas, or any other gentleman who rose and addressed the Chair, had a right to an hour. The gentleman from Texas happened to be the first man up.

Mr. MANN. The Chair will pardon me, but the gentleman from Texas occupied a considerable time on yesterday after the motion was made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER. As the Chair stated, there was a kind of interlocutory performance among several gentleman down there. Nobody made a speech. There were suggestions bandied back and forth.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas had the floor for a considerable time, but if the Chair has no record of it, I have no desire to press the matter. I thought possibly the Chair had a record of the time that he occupied on yesterday after the motion was made by the gentleman from Mississippi. At the proper time, Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois at the proper time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] for a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask this question: In the first place, I will state, as the RECORD shows, that I was one of those Members who favored yesterday afternoon immediate action or ratification of the names that the gentleman from Texas proposed—not because I believed that he or his Committee on Rules had the authority to make the nominations, but because I thought it would get our party out of the very embarrassing position in which we found ourselves. Now, the gentleman has thrown other features this morning into the discussion upon this matter, to wit: He has indicated that in the near future, if gentlemen who were opposing him yesterday prosecute that matter, that he will reveal matters in this House that he had not referred to fully and entirely. Now, I certainly am perfectly honest in my desire for information, for I am not aware of any connivance or arrangement or any recognized division for selfish ends on this side of the House. I frankly state that I am not among those Members consulted by the gentleman from Texas about the names submitted by him. Nor do I take any exception to his course, but I respectfully ask him to let me know, as a supporter on his side of the question, what he means by the intimations he has thrown out. Is there any clique, is there any prearrangement or attempt this way, is there any agreement among the Democratic Members of this side, or any number of them, for certain selfish purposes, as the gentleman indicates there is, and who leads such a movement?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will answer that, and say no; but when I deem it necessary and appropriate, if we reach that stage, I will say whatever I think should be said. I am keeping nothing from Members here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman certainly is. Why did you deem it necessary and appropriate at this time to refer to it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will say that there is no clique. I said what I thought I ought to have said, and I measured my words when I made the statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, I think, to be perfectly frank, that the gentleman ought to tell us what it is.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. How is the question before the House at this time, the resolution and the motion—as a matter of privilege or as a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is before the House as a privileged resolution affecting the organization of the House, not as coming from the Committee on Rules especially, but it is a matter affecting the organization of the House, and the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to refer it is a subsidiary motion affecting the resolution itself.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is a motion to strike out a name and insert one in order previous to a vote upon the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. If the motion to refer should be voted down, then any gentleman on the floor in the present situation has a right to offer to amend this original resolution by striking out any name and substituting another, or by striking out all of the names and substituting others. That is true until some gentleman moves the previous question and the previous question is ordered. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to preface the few observations which I shall make on this motion by stating to the House the very high esteem with which I regard the gentleman from Texas, who has moved the selection of the committee authorized by the resolution known as the Sugar Trust investigation resolution. Nor do I want to appear here as objecting to any of the gentlemen who have been named by the gentleman from Texas on that committee. My objection to the motion made by the gentleman from Texas goes deeper than the question of the individuals or the gentlemen whose names appear in the resolution. The investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co. is one that strikes a popular chord throughout the country; in fact, we have it from the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Rules that on the Rules Committee there is no opposition to this investigation.

It is, however, necessary, in order to obtain that evidence which will prove or disprove the common belief throughout the country regarding this corporation, that the investigation should be thorough, complete, and managed by men who understand the methods pursued by this corporation. The gentleman from Texas assumes the responsibility, as I understand, for the selection of five members of that committee. He does not state who selected the other four. Perhaps if the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority on the floor, were asked the question he might be able to enlighten the House as to who selected the other four. In the selection of this committee I find that there are at least five members of that committee from States producing beet sugar. I find no one on that committee from either the State which I in part have the honor to represent and the State which in part the gentleman from Texas himself represents, the two States which are producing fully one-third of the entire American output of sugar. I would like to know if gentlemen, no matter how well posted they may be in regard to the process of producing sugar in the beet States and the process developed in the disposition of the output of the best sugar factories in the West, are qualified entirely to investigate the workings of the American Sugar Refining Co. toward the people of Louisiana and Texas in the disposition of the crops of those two great States. And yet the production of sugar from cane in this country, one-third of the entire production, is from the States of Louisiana and Texas. No one is placed on this committee to represent that interest. The American Sugar Refining Co., if not guilty of any other charge, is certainly guilty of the charge of controlling the market of sugar in both Louisiana and Texas, and yet when they come to form this committee, pursuing a system of incognito statesmanship where no one is responsible for the selection of the members, instead of placing the duty upon the Speaker of the House, a list is handed to the House, no one wishes to question the personnel of the names suggested, no one is given an opportunity to ascertain just what qualifications the gentlemen suggested possess, but all at once the resolution presented is within a short while passed by the House——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I have just a minute more?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield the gentleman one minute additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I should say, Mr. Speaker, without criticizing the position of the gentleman from Texas, that this resolution should be sent to the Ways and Means Committee primarily, or I should say, in right, it should be turned over to the Speaker himself that he might investigate the matter and make the proper assignments in order that something like results may come from this investigation. [Applause on the Republican side.] But if the Speaker is unwilling to assume the responsibility of the great office which he occupies [applause of the Republican side], then, I say, the matter should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means that heretofore has selected all the other committees of the House, and that committee should look into the matter and report a committee qualified in every respect to handle this subject as it should be handled if it is not intended to absolutely play politics with this resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House yesterday afternoon when the first resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas naming nine Members to constitute a committee to investigate the steel corporations of the country was offered. Had I been I would have made the same objection to the procedure as I afterwards advanced to the naming of the members of this committee. I came into the House when this resolution was being read, and I then asked questions as to how the membership of the committee had been selected. I stated that if the procedure were to be followed on another occasion the resolution would not go through as easily as it appeared yesterday. I have since examined the personnel of both committees and, so far as I am concerned, I should say in justice to the individuals named that I have not the slightest objection to any Member upon either one of them. But the objection which I raise, Mr. Speaker, is not to the personnel of the committee, but is to the method by which these men were selected, and I wish to speak very frankly, because intimations have been made that some attempt was made after the first resolution was adopted to halt the investigation of the sugar companies. I am particularly interested in the investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co. and the other sugar refining companies of the country. The Arbuckles, the largest independent refiners in the United States, are located in my district. The American Sugar Refining Co., which has in the Borough of Brooklyn, from which I come, though not in the district which I represent, the plants in which the gross frauds against the Government were perpetrated.

President Taft in his first annual message to Congress, if I be not mistaken, asked that the investigation by Congress of these concerns be delayed else by chance it might interfere with the administration of justice. After a reasonable time had elapsed—I think it was the entire session—I introduced a resolution calling upon the President to state what reasons, if any, then existed for deferring an investigation of these sugar companies. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who made a speech on this floor that will not soon be forgotten about these same concerns, will testify that the speech was made after some extended conference with myself in which I furnished some, if not much, of the information used by him at the time. I am anxious to have these concerns investigated, because it would seem that a gross miscarriage of justice is taking place, and while a number of petty employees of these concerns have been convicted and have been given the penalty of the law, not a single man of any importance, as I can recall, in either one, has been brought to the bar and sentenced for gross frauds extending over a number of years and which resulted in the voluntary payment of several million dollars to the Government.

Now, that will forestall any disclosure as to my connection or interest in any way with this resolution. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] misunderstands the entire ground of this criticism.

On two occasions in the last Congress the House provided that special committees should be elected. A caucus was held, at which Members present were not nominated, but members of the caucus voted for whom they pleased on these committees, and as a result, in both instances, there being more candidates than the number of men to go on the committees, those selected by the majority in the caucus were the ones selected by the Democrats to represent them upon the committees. If this side of the House is to elect its committees, then I am in favor of having some sort of election that means an election and not a farce and a pretense of an election, by which the gentleman from Texas or some other individual, either with or without consultation with other Members, can present a resolution naming certain individuals to be ratified by the vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like a few minutes more time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have promised all the time at my disposal. I regret that I can not give the gentleman more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I regret it, too, because I would like to make some reply to statements which have been made concerning myself. Of course, unless the gentleman moves the previous question——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have only 10 minutes of the hour remaining, but I will help the gentleman to get time, if I can, after the 10 minutes is consumed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I join in the request, provided it does not interfere with the time allowed to me under the rules.

The SPEAKER. Of course it would not do that.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] had yielded the balance of his time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I agreed to yield it, and the gentlemen to whom I yielded it wished to speak.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it was not for the purpose either of halting the investigation, which I have been interested in for several years, or of quibbling over technicalities, or of interfering with harmony on this side of the House that I expressed my opinion upon the method adopted in this matter. I understood from the statement of the gentleman from Texas on yesterday that it had been believed that the duty had devolved upon the Committee on Rules to make these recommendations. He states to-day that he assumes the responsibility—and, of course, he must—for offering this resolution, and states that he did it as an individual. But if that is the manner in which committees of the House are to be elected, I wish to call the attention of the House at this time to what may be the result.

Assume that some other special committee is created and provision is made that it shall be elected by the House. Nothing can prevent the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] or some one else on that side of the House from selecting a committee, selecting the members from this side of the House, members whom he believes will not be objected to, and could not be criticized, and could not be objected to without a great injustice being done to them, then selecting the members of the minority, and then offering the resolution naming such individuals as a privileged resolution, saying that the purpose was to permit the House to elect the committee, and if anyone were dissatisfied with the personnel they could substitute other names for those suggested by him.

The committee would in that case probably be elected by the House in form, but in effect it would be selected by the minority leader of this House. Instead of having an election of committees we would, because of the peculiar condition that would exist, turn over to the minority or to some free lance the selection of the committees, on the pretext that it was being done by an election by the House.

I am too much interested in the success of the Democratic Party in this House and in the country to see such a plan initiated.

So far as this committee is concerned, I wish simply to say this: I have no objection to any member upon it. I have no objection to any member upon the other committee, and I should say, further, that no Member on this side of the House, either from the New York delegation or from any other delegation, conferred with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] on my behalf or after a conference with me as to who should be placed upon either one of these committees. I knew nothing about any movement to select them until I heard the resolution read at the Clerk's desk, and I hope that may satisfy those who may perhaps think there is some peculiar or undisclosed or mysterious reason for my statement in connection with this resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman from New York, once for all, that I exonerate him completely. He did not talk to me, directly or indirectly, about this resolution or about the personnel of the committee, and I have no desire to cast any aspersion upon him. I want the gentleman to understand that. I do not impugn his motives, and the only regret I have, and here express, is that he could not see his way clear to support this resolution and agree to the personnel of the committee. I was regretting that. I did not mean to reflect on the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know the gentleman did not intend to do so, but the language he employed was very unfortunate. I have not said at any time that I opposed or desired to oppose or proposed to oppose the resolution or to interfere or to attempt to interfere with the personnel of the committee. I think it highly important now to the Members named in that resolution that they should be elected by the House, lest an unfortunate misunderstanding should go out to the country regarding them.

And I wish to say, not only for that reason but because I believe the Members are well qualified for the work and fitted for it, that there is no objection to them. I shall vote to adopt the resolution rather than send it to the Committee on Rules.

But I do not wish to have the fact lost sight of that the method pursued is, in my opinion, indefensible, however meritorious it may appear to others, and I sincerely trust that such a method will not be followed in the future, because if it should be, regardless of those named in the resolution, whether they be properly equipped or not, or regardless of the source from which it comes, I shall not vote for the men named in the resolution presented under such circumstances.

And let me say to the gentleman from Texas that his position will hardly square with what we are attempting to do. He says that as the Representative of the eleventh district of Texas he nominates these men to the House; but when the late Speaker was Speaker of the House, as Representative of the eighteenth Illinois district, he nominated committees to the House; the House then had the same right, under the rules, by resolution to have substituted other names for the committees named by him.

If we are to have committees elected by the House, if this side of the House is to follow that method, then one of two things should be done, either opportunity should be given for men in the Democratic caucus to express preferences without directly antagonizing some individual Member for membership on the committees, or the Committee on Ways and Means, the members of which under the Democratic caucus rules are prohibited from serving upon any other committee, should act as a nominating committee. If that be done, it will save much controversy and much contention and much unnecessary discussion and will conduce very much to the success and harmony of the party in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I presume that the same objection would have been made to the Steel Trust resolution that was made to this resolution, and I desire that the RECORD shall show the exact circumstances under which I became aware of the fact that the Steel Trust resolution was being considered.

The Committee of the Whole House had arisen, the Speaker had taken the chair, and the report had been made, and a majority of the Members, or a great number of the Members, had their hats in hand, expecting the House to immediately adjourn. I had started out of the door when I heard a resolution being read, and I stopped at the rail and listened and then came back and sat down, and before I realized exactly what had happened the Steel Trust resolution had passed.

Now, I asked on yesterday that at the proper time unanimous consent be granted that the nomination of this committee be referred to the Ways and Means Committee. That would be the regular course to be pursued. But the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD], for personal reasons, did not want that resolution referred to that committee. But that resolution is now out of the way. I do not presume that unanimous consent would be granted to vacate that order and let it go in the regular way.

I want to take this occasion to say that there is not a man in the House for whom I have a higher regard than the gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Rules Committee. I believe he is as patriotic as he is able and strong. Every single member on both of these committees is entirely satisfactory to me; but we ought to have some rule, some orderly procedure adopted, so that Members may know that when a certain committee is suggested to the House somebody has to take the responsibility of naming it.

Now, the Speaker, under the rules, may nominate the committees except the regular standing committees of the House, but if the Speaker does not name the committees the logical interpretation of the rule would be that it should go to the Ways and Means Committee. It would be infinitely better to let the Speaker of the House appoint the committees under the old régime than to have a man come in and suggest the names without anybody assuming the responsibility of nominating the committee on motion in this House. [Applause.]

Now, it is the principle involved in this question that I object to. I myself was in favor of taking out of the hands of the Speaker the power of appointing the committees. That was done by the Democratic Party, and it has worked with marvelous success and has been approved of generally by the country. I do not want to make this magnificent stride in the right direction ridiculous by a proceeding of this kind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since the Steel Trust resolution is out of the way, and in view of the statement made by the chairman of the Rules Committee that if this resolution is referred to his committee they would have nothing to do with it, I am compelled to change my motion and ask that this resolution be referred to the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that an amendment would be in order to that effect.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi has not the floor to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it in order for the gentleman from Mississippi to withdraw his motion of yesterday without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The motion could be withdrawn in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Without objection?

The SPEAKER. In the House he has the right to withdraw his motion or amendment before it is voted on.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And no Member has a right to make an objection to it?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I heard the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], yesterday say that it would embarrass him to refer this question to that committee, and I know it would, and I do not think it is right to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that nobody has made a motion to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means, but the trouble about it all is that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And I have none?

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Alabama has none. The gentleman from Texas has five minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield those five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I regret very sincerely that such a situation as now confronts us has arisen. I could not let it go by without protest when presented on yesterday. I believe that this House should be democratic in every particular. I believe that in making up its committees the Democratic caucus ought to name the Democratic members and the Republican caucus the Republican members of the committees. I believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] would be as competent as any other two gentlemen to perform those respective functions, but in my opinion the membership of the House itself ought to have done these things. I think it was a mistake, but there was a little heat in the matter yesterday. It struck some of our ideals a little suddenly. It aroused our antagonism against an old order of things that we thought we had whipped out of existence, and we spoke somewhat suddenly. I have been looking over the names that have been presented, and I want to say now that I had no personal objection to any of those that were proposed on this committee as members of the committee. They are good, true, stalwart Democrats [applause on the Democratic side], ready to do their part and support the policies of their party and work out the welfare of the country. I believe that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] made a mistake, but since it has gone so far I believe that it were better that we should say to him, "Go thy way and sin no more," and we will elect this committee this time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe the gentleman from Texas to be a patriotic Member of this House, the equal of any here, and that he realizes as fully as I do that he committed an error. I believe that he is a good and true man, and that he inadvertently fell into this pitfall, and I would ask my friend from Mississippi not to press his motion to recommit, but to let us all close up this incident now and elect this committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let it go on and perform its service, and let us, by the light of experience, in the future avoid such errors.

Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty to say this because for many years I have been an advocate on this floor—sometimes I was very lonesome, because I had no support—against a policy of one-man power. I believe that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is of the opinion that there ought to be no one-man power, but in the haste to get up these committees, in the fear that there might arise some friction, he fell into the pitfall to which I have referred; and I am sure he recognizes that as clearly as do I. I know he is as anxious to serve the party and the country as am I, and I would respectfully ask the gentleman from Mississippi to withdraw his motion. Let us elect this committee, and then let us see to it that this thing does not happen again. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I beg the gentleman from Mississippi, let us not carry this thing any further now. There are some other matters that we want to deal with, and let us elect this committee, because they are good men, and especially do not make the motion to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the pending motion by striking out the words "the Committee on Rules" and inserting "a select committee of 15 Members."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moves to commit the resolution to a select committee of 15 Members.

Mr. MANN. What I move to do is to strike out and insert. The motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, as I understand, is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules. I move to strike out the words "the Committee on Rules" and insert "a select committee of 15 Members."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the motion. The motion is to strike out the words "Rules Committee" or "Committee on Rules," whichever it is, in the motion, and to refer it to a select committee of 15.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. How does the gentleman propose to select the committee?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Virginia, who is or ought to be a member of the Committee on Rules, had studied the rules as carefully as he studies most questions he would have recalled the fact that the rules provide that select committees should be appointed by the Speaker unless otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. CARLIN. I was familiar with the fact, but I wanted to get it before the House.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Virginia had contained his soul in patience for a moment it would not have required the efforts of the gentleman from Virginia to get it before the House.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask the Speaker if I at this moment could be permitted to withdraw my motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman asking unanimous consent——

Mr. SISSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. If it can be done without my losing the floor.

Mr. SISSON. I ask permission to withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion.

Mr. BROUSSARD and Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has the absolute right to withdraw his motion.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman asked unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I thought the Speaker gave me the information that it required unanimous consent. I ask to withdraw my motion if I can do so. I desire to withdraw the motion.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this parliamentary suggestion, and that is that the gentleman from Mississippi has no power over his motion now since there is an amendment on the motion which is pending before the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a rule that is right in point, page 377 of the Manual, where the statement is made that "a motion may be withdrawn although an amendment may have been offered and may be pending." The reference is to section 5347, volume 5, Hinds' Precedents.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order while the Clerk reads a section from Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion may be withdrawn in the House although an amendment to it may have been offered and may be pending. On April 14, 1892, Mr. Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan, moved that there be omitted from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the chapters of a book entitled "Protection and Free Trade," which had been incorporated in the remarks of Mr. William Stone, of Kentucky.

Mr. George W. Fithian, of Illinois, moved to amend the motion by striking out from the RECORD a certain letter published in a speech of Mr. J. P. Dolliver, of Iowa.

Mr. Burrows then withdrew his motion, to which withdrawal Mr. Fithian objected, and submitted the question or order whether the resolution could be withdrawn without the consent of the House, pending the motion to amend.

The Speaker held that the mover could withdraw the resolution, there having been no amendment adopted or decision thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi withdraws his motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moves to recommit the resolution to a select committee of 15 members.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order upon that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman need not reserve it. He may make it. Let the gentleman make his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not want to dispose of it until I hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. MANN. I prefer to have the gentleman make the point of order. The gentleman can not reserve his point of order unless it be by unanimous consent. The gentleman may make his point if he has one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not press the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to one hour.

Mr. MANN. I was not in favor of referring this resolution to the Committee on Rules nor would I be in favor of referring it to the Committee on Ways and Means. Three of the gentlemen named in the resolution belonged to the Committee on Rules, and at least one of the gentlemen named is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. I think perhaps no one takes exception, so far as I know, to the membership of the committee. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] stated that the Republican members of the committee were suggested by myself. That is correct. I did not know what method might be pursued in the selection of this committee when it was first provided for. I did not know——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend? The House will be in order. Members have a right to hear what is said on an important question like this. Those desiring to converse will please retire to the cloakrooms.

Mr. MANN. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the confusion on that side of the House comes because gentlemen are endeavoring to ascertain by conversation and consultation between themselves whether they better vote for or against the motion which I have offered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not require any consultation, discussion, or consideration on this side of the House.

Mr. MANN. Very few things receive consideration on that side of the House, in so far as we are informed in the House. What consideration may be received in caucus no one on this side of the House is able to say. Now, Mr. Speaker, I did suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] the minority members of this and the steel-investigating committee. When the committees were first provided for and resolutions were introduced, I said to gentlemen privately on that side of the House that I thought these committees ought to be appointed by the Speaker. When the resolution for the sugar investigation was passed, the matter was suggested as to whether the so-called minority leader on this side of the House had the right to even suggest the names of the minority members. I did not assume that the minority leader had the right to name members of any committee. I took the liberty of suggesting and recommending to the gentleman from Texas, at his request, names of Republican Members as minority members of this committee, feeling that, at least, I had the equal right with any Member of the House to make a presentation which any Member of the House has. And it is fair to state that the resolution providing for the election of these committees passed this House more than a week ago. I do not know who is authorized to call a caucus of the Democratic side of the House, but if speed was intended, and an investigation was intended, even on that side of the House, some gentleman has been derelict in duty in not having had a Democratic caucus called after a week's time had elasped without the selection of a committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, this question is a question for precedents. I do not believe it is advisable or desirable to name select committees by any gentleman in the House arising on the floor and offering a resolution which shall be agreed to as a matter of form by the House itself. Of course, the resolution is privileged. Any Member within a week's time has had the right at any time when the House is in session to offer a resolution suggesting or nominating the members of this committee. But some procedure ought to be agreed upon for the selection in advance of election of these committees. Some precedent ought to be established so that Members of the House, on both sides of the House, may know whom to consult and to whom they may suggest Members for committees or opposition to Members named on committees.

It seems to me that the proper course to pursue when a resolution naming a committee is offered in the House, would be that it may be referred, where a special committee is provided for, to a select committee to be named by the Speaker. The original propaganda in reference to the appointment of committees by a committee never contemplated that committees should be selected by caucuses. It contemplated that a committee on committees might be selected by the House in some manner representing both sides of the House, where both sides of the House might consider the membership of committees and bring the proposed membership before the House for approval. Everyone knows that the ideal method of selecting committees is not by caucus action.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Illinois has just deplored the fact that no precedent has been established for cases of this kind.

Mr. MANN. I have deplored no such fact at all. I have not spoken of it.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman spoke more than once of the wisdom or the necessity of having a precedent established, and the gentleman now speaks of the necessity of having a select committee to which this resolution might be referred.

Mr. MANN. Exactly.

Mr. COOPER. Now, let me ask the gentleman whether we did not create a precedent in a case on all fours with this one when the resolution came up for the appointment of the Ballinger-Pinchot committee, and the House decided that that committee should be elected by the House? When the House so decided, the Republican majority promptly called a caucus. So did the Democratic minority. No one was more active in the caucus of the Republican majority than was the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, now the leader of the minority. That was a precedent which the gentleman knew about. That was a precedent which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] also knew about. The gentleman from Texas said he consulted with certain Members on his side of the House——

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. COOPER. He says "we agreed"——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. And then he says he came over to this side and consulted with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the minority membership. The gentleman from Illinois suggested the names of the men from the minority to go on this committee. There was no caucus.

The precedent about which the gentleman from Illinois was fully informed was deliberately overlooked, disregarded, violated by both the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the precedent cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin is, I think, fairly in point with considerable force. However, the rules of the House have now provided a different method of selecting committees from the method formerly provided by the rules, and I say again that I think it is now quite important that we establish a precedent for the selection of committees under the rules.

So far as the action taken by myself is concerned, as the minority leader, I have no apologies to make for that. At the caucus—which unfortunately was not attended by my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]—I was given authority to select the membership of committees, so far as recommendations were concerned from the minority side. And yet I should have preferred in this case, as in other cases, that the members of committees might be selected either by caucus or by the method which I have now proposed, namely, that they shall be passed upon by a select committee of the House, composed both of the majority and the minority.

I would have, been quite content to have let the Speaker name these special committees. I have more confidence in the Speaker than the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House have. I am willing to let the Speaker name the minority members of the committees, believing that he will deal fairly. But the majority of this House—the Democratic side—do not have enough confidence in the Speaker to even let him name the Democratic members of the committees. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am willing now to let this resolution and the names go to a select committee named by the Speaker of the House. Why, is it possible that the Democratic Members of the House distrust the man whom we all honor as Speaker of the House, the man who is Speaker of the House as to both sides of the House, the man whom the Democratic side have honored by presenting him and electing him as Speaker, whom the country is now favorably considering as candidate for President? [Prolonged applause and cheers.]

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party can make no better selection for its candidate than the present Speaker of this House. [Applause.] But is it possible that the Democratic side of the House that is in favor of the election and selection of our Speaker as President, where he will have the appointment of the great administrative forces of the Government, are not proud enough of him to let him select a committee which will pass upon the members of a committee of investigation?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. May I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that there is one important distinction between the two propositions, from the fact that the Speaker has stated that he did not want to appoint the committee, whereas he has not said he would not accept a nomination for President. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has not said that he will accept the Democratic nomination for President, but no one who knows him believes that he ever shirks a responsibility that is placed upon him. [Laughter and applause.] Do you think that if the House should authorize him to name the committee that he will shirk that responsibility? He has more courage and bravery than the whole balance of you on this question. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Illinois think it probable that when the Speaker is elected President of the United States he will confer with a committee as to the selection of the members of his Cabinet and other officers of the Government whom he will have to appoint?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is probable that he will ever be elected President. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. Are we justified, Mr. Speaker, in taking the declaration of the gentleman from Illinois as an announcement of his own candidacy? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have entered upon an era of investigation. Numerous resolutions are pending in the House for the appointment of investigating committees. It is idle to say that every time there is a vacancy on a standing committee or a proposed appointment of a special committee a caucus shall be called of both sides of this House for the purpose of determining the membership of those committees. In a short time it would be impossible to obtain anything more than a bare quorum of a caucus.

But if the committee were to be appointed by the Speaker, it would be after every Member of the House had the right and the opportunity to talk with the Speaker about the membership of that committee, and the committee appointed by the committee to pass upon the committee to be elected by the House would protect, it seems to me, every position which has been taken by the most advanced theorist on the subject of the election of committees.

I think that the proper method is to say that any gentleman of the House at any time may offer a resolution for the appointment of the special committee which has been provided for by the House and have that resolution referred to a special committee, if the House is not willing in the first instance, as I am willing, to trust the appointment of the original committee to the Speaker. But gentlemen having commenced the plan of electing committees by the House have been tender on the subject. They know very well that the caucus selection of committees by the Democratic side of the House was only made possible without a row by unfairly increasing the membership of the big committees and taking the increase for themselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois spoke of the fact that I did not attend a caucus called by Republicans at the opening of this session.

Mr. MANN. I did not do it invidiously.

Mr. COOPER. Certainly not. I understand that. Mr. Speaker, I did not attend that caucus because I anticipated that, among other things, it might take some such action as that narrated by the gentleman from Illinois, to wit, conferring upon him the power to select the Representatives from this side of the House on select committees.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would like to ask why the gentleman did not attend that caucus to determine whether or not he might not, with others present in that caucus, have power to take some other action?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman comes from Pennsylvania, and I can well understand why the sacredness of a caucus appeals to him. [Laughter and applause.] I will, with pleasure, answer his question.

Mr. Speaker, there is a fundamental difference between a caucus and a conference. At a meeting called as a caucus those in attendance are considered as pledging themselves in advance to abide by the decision of the caucus majority, whatever that may be, and at the risk, if disobedient, of being branded as a violator of plighted faith and a party "bolter." But this is not true of a conference, a meeting which Representatives are free to attend, with every desire to do what is best for their party, but free, also, after it is over, to vote in the House as they believe, under their oaths, will be best for the country.

I will attend a conference and discuss policies, principles, and methods with my party associates, and I have no doubt that in a very large majority of instances I will vote as the majority may decide, but I will not go to a caucus and be understood as absolutely binding myself in advance to vote on the floor of the House as a majority of the caucus may dictate.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Just a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER. Well, Mr. Speaker, if my time can be extended I will be very glad later to yield. When we had before us the famous emergency currency bill——

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman is talking about the other matter, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin declined to yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not desire that he should leave the question——

Mr. COOPER. Oh, the gentleman need feel no anxiety about my leaving his question. I will answer it, if I can. If I can not, I will say so. But I can answer this question. When the famous emergency currency bill——

Mr. BOWMAN. Oh, you are some distance from the subject now. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be in order. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER. I do not know what the complaint is that the gentleman has, Mr. Speaker; but it is serious. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. COOPER. No; not now for a question.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I might yield for an answer, if the gentleman would tell us what ails him. [Laughter.] I will ask the gentleman please to let me proceed for three minutes.

Mr. Speaker, to recur to the emergency currency bill, for it was while that bill was pending that the Republican majority deliberately and expressly recognized the difference between a caucus and a conference. We heard more than once on this floor during the last Congress that certain Members on this side of the House violated a caucus decree on that bill, and that that was one of the reasons why they were afterwards punished. The gentleman who made the speech repeated that statement several times. But the fact is that there was no caucus on that bill, but only a conference. The resolution presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], still a Member of the House—I have a copy of it—provided in express terms that the meeting should not be a caucus and that any Representative in attendance upon that conference had the right to reserve to himself perfect freedom of action on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COOPER. And so every man present at that Republican conference—originally called as a conference and expressly declared to be a conference by the vote of the meeting itself—reserved to himself the right to vote as he thought might be best for his party and for the country. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it was during the last Congress asserted on this floor that that meeting was a caucus, and that for not voting in the House as the caucus dictated Members had made themselves amenable to the power of the Speaker, and for that reason, among others, had been by him justly punished. That punishment and the reasons assigned for it make clear the difference between a caucus and a conference. Men held that to be a caucus, and assigned as a reason for the removal of men from committees that they must be punished because they had disregarded a caucus decree.

As I have said, I will not pledge myself in advance to vote in the House as a caucus may dictate.

Mr. BOWMAN rose.

Mr. COOPER. One moment, I can not reconcile attendance upon a caucus, as so understood, with the oath we all take as Representatives:

> You do solemnly swear that you will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that you will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that you take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that to the best of your ability you will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office upon which you are about to enter, so help you God.

Think of a man taking an oath like that before God and his country, and then pledging himself in advance to vote as the caucus tells him to vote——

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. His conscience may say no, his constituents may say no, his better judgment may be outraged, yet the caucus says vote it, and so he votes it. But does he keep his oath well and faithfully to discharge the duties of his office? No man, not even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, can defend the practice. Conferences, not caucuses, should be called for purposes of deliberation by the Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield? [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. With pleasure.

Mr. BOWMAN. I will state to the gentleman that though a new Member of this House I attended that caucus, for information, as I believe a new Member should. I will say further that, though a Member from Pennsylvania, I represent as independent a district and am as independent a Representative as the gentleman who has spoken. Now, further to the question at issue. At that caucus there was a vote taken upon the question at issue, whether or not one man or a committee should select these committees, and though a new Member I spoke in favor of the selection of the committees by a committee. There was an election taken, and the result was 33 to 72, as I recall it. There was a number, I am informed, of those who call themselves progressives, I believe, who refused to attend the conference or caucus or whatever it may have been called. That would have made 50 who would have been in favor of a more general representation of the people. If those men had been present there would have been 50 to 72. There might have been some men on the fence who possibly would have been influenced to vote for what might be called the more progressive feature, if those who would have voted with us had been present, and we might then have had an opportunity of avoiding this controversy and waste of time which is taken up by this controversy.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman misunderstands my position entirely. I do not doubt that caucuses sometimes declare for what would be best for the country, but I am unwilling absolutely to bind myself in advance to do what the caucus may dictate.

Frequently the decision of a caucus represents the judgment not of a majority, but only of a minority of the whole body. Let me give an illustration. Suppose there were only 100 Members of this House, 51 Republicans and 49 Democrats. Suppose that upon some new and important proposition the Republicans are divided, 26 in favor and 25 against. Suppose that the 49 Democrats also are against. Then, suppose that the 26 Republicans call a caucus and that all of the Republicans attend.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. I am under great obligations to the gentleman. I will conclude in less time than that, I think. Twenty-six Republicans, forming a Republican majority, call a caucus. Every man attending it is under party rule and binds himself in advance to obey the caucus decree. Those 26 dictate how the 25 other Republicans shall vote. The 51 go into the House of Representatives and overwhelm the 49 Democrats, but it is not a majority of the representatives of the people which is legislating for the country; it is a small minority of 26 out of 100. This is legislation by caucus.

Ours is a Government of majorities, under the Constitution and the laws, but a government by caucus is very frequently government by a minority.

I have thus indicated the reason why I did not attend the caucus spoken of by the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman who called that caucus knew what "caucus" meant. I did not attend it. As a Representative in Congress my duty is to the whole country, and I can not consent to surrender my individual judgment and my vote to a party caucus.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the motion proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, because I believe of the three methods which have been discussed to-day for the selection of this committee that proposed by him is preferable. The action that we take upon this resolution is important, for, in all probability, it will create a precedent to be followed in the future. The three methods which have been proposed are, first, the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] nominating this committee, and if that resolution shall be adopted in that form we will have the precedent created that in the future whenever a committee reports a resolution for the creation of a select committee, the chairman of that committee shall have the right and authority to nominate members of the committee.

Now, I am opposed to that method, and it seems so clear that that ought not to be the method followed by the House as to require no argument. We all see readily the embarrassment of Members in the House, even though they have the right to amend, to offer amendments, unless there shall be a secret ballot, to nominations made by the chairman of any committee.

The second method is that of the selection by the majority and minority caucuses. Mr. Speaker, upon such a resolution as this I am opposed to the selection of committees by a caucus of either party. What political question is there involved in this resolution? If the Sugar Trust is violating the laws of this country, if additional legislation is necessary, are not Republicans as much in favor of that legislation as Democrats are? What political question is involved?

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that this special committee is so different from other special committees that a different rule shall pertain to the method of selecting its personnel?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say this, that as to a select committee having to do with matters of very great importance to the country, I think it is just as important, if the standing committees are to be elected by the House, that such select committees should also be elected by the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. The point I want to bring the gentleman's attention to is this, Is the work of this committee so freed of any partisan bias as to relieve it of any rule that might apply to other committees? Now, I want the gentleman, when he is differentiating between the various committees, to indicate what select committees he thinks ought to be appointed by an election and what ones should not; and I would like him also, in that connection, to say whether he considers the rule of the House providing for the appointment of select committees by the Speaker should be abrogated or not.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, if this were a special committee having to do, for example, with the investigation of the tariff question, involving two great theories of government, that would be a committee where I would say the political questions are involved; but not in a case like this.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman conceive that there have been, and may be now, such political differences as to the treatment of trusts and as to the effect of the tariff on the formation of trusts as to present just such a case as he is suggesting in the case of the sugar investigation?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. LENROOT. I would be glad if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] would discuss that in his own time.

Now, I was stating, when I was interrupted, that I saw no possible political question involved in this resolution. If that be so, then it ought not to be a subject of political caucus action.

The third proposition is the one now before the House, proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], for the appointment of a select committee by the Speaker of the House, which shall nominate to the House the members of this committee. If this is adopted it will be an action by the House duly empowering—not as a political matter, but embodying the action of the House as a whole—the creation of a committee to make nominations to the House. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that upon this question, if we are to go on here assuming that these questions must be decided by caucus action upon one side or the other, we will not represent the country as this House ought to represent it. And to you gentlemen of the majority, if you shall proceed in the way that you are pointing now, I prophesy that you will be stranded upon the rocks if you will rest your case upon caucus action instead of considering these questions upon their merits, regardless of whether they arise upon one side of this aisle or upon the other. [Applause.]

Yesterday afternoon, just before adjournment, Mr. Speaker, we heard a great many gentlemen upon the other side of the aisle protesting against the resolution of the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] used this language:

> I protest now, Mr. Speaker, in the name of the American people, that such policy as is now being inaugurated is un-Democratic and un-American.

Yet a little less than an hour ago we heard the same gentleman advocating the withdrawal of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and the adoption of this pending resolution. Mr. Speaker, if that proposition was un-Democratic and un-American last night, is it any less so to-day? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Missouri said further that while he thought there was a mistake committed yesterday, "Let us go ahead and sin no more," thus admonishing his colleagues upon that side. But I want to remind the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that his side has not sinned as yet. No one has voted upon this proposition. No error has been committed yet. It is for you to say whether you will adopt what the gentleman from Missouri says is an un-American and un-Democratic proposition, or whether you shall vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It is not too late. You have not yet sinned. You have not committed any error as yet. The question is, Are you going to do so? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Not that he is on my side. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the distinguished leader of the minority for this courtesy. I can not support his proposition in this matter, and I am sorry to say I can support him in nothing else which he presents in his capacity as minority leader. Personally he is a very lovable and genial gentleman and does what is right. As a minority leader he is a most skillful attorney, managing their case, and not trying to harmonize and lead the Democracy to success, but endeavoring to minister to their dissensions and confusion. [Laughter.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I want to know whether the reasons the gentleman mentions were the reasons why the gentleman from Illinois recognized the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MANN. I might be glad to recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma if he could do as well.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the reply of the gentleman from Illinois, but I have no doubt that it was appropriate. When the House adjourned yesterday evening I was claiming recognition by the Chair, and I felt like I was pregnant with celestial fire. I was cut off by adjournment and the speech died within me, and you no doubt know from experience how it feels to be done that way. It may be that if delivery had been permitted it would have been something less brilliant than stars, suns, and heavenly constellations. [Laughter.]

This morning I listened with great interest to the illuminating debate on this momentous question. I fear now that I will not be able to shed much radiance upon it. I did desire to make peace when it appeared that war was raging beyond control in the majority ranks through the temporary excitement and indiscretion of some of my sensitive and impulsive Democratic friends, feeling that I would like to pour oil on the troubled waters. You know that since the dissolution of the Standard Oil corporation oil ought to be cheap enough to spread over and compose a large expanse of tempestuous waters.

Mr. Speaker, I did not begrudge the temporary pleasure the minority was enjoying from the temporary discord on this side. God knows it is the first pleasure they have had since the extra session began. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] They were wise to make the most of it while they could, for it was not long before the gentleman from Illinois came to the bat, and then they relapsed into discord and dissension on their side of the House. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the precedent which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] brings to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois is, in my judgment, an unhappy one, because it proves too much for the present purpose of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois stated to us that he was invested by the Republican caucus with the power of making these selections himself. The general impression was and is that the majority caucus referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin not only selected the members of the Ballinger committee for that side of the House, but went far enough to advise, revise, and dictate the personnel of those on this side of the House—then the minority also—and that would not suit the gentleman from Illinois in this emergency. He has good ground to object to caucus action, because he is already invested with power. Following that precedent would compel the Democratic caucus to nominate the entire committee.

The two gentlemen from Wisconsin do not seem to be disposed to favor the caucus because they are opposed to caucus action entirely. So the devil himself and 400 Philadelphia lawyers could not tell from the discussion what it is they want on that side of the House. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois temporarily is willing to renounce the authority with which he is invested and to refer it to a special committee. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] would go clear back to the beginning of species by electing a committee to elect a committee to select a committee subsequently created to select another committee, and where would the beginning ever be found and when would the investigation be commenced? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not wish the gentleman to be under a misapprehension. I am sure that the gentleman wants to be right. I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAMSON. With the addition that the gentleman from Wisconsin would like to have a committee elected to elect that committee and a committee elected to elect that committee and a committee elected to elect that committee, and a way on back to the origin of species; when would you ever start and when would you ever finish?

Mr. Speaker, what is there in this thing? Simply this: A Member of this House—there is no controversy about that—rises and offers a resolution to appoint a committee. The original Democracy was that everybody gathered in mass on the plain or under the trees and everybody voted and everybody spoke and everybody acted. What could more perfectly carry out the idea actuating the Democrats of electing committees than for a man to get up and say, I move to elect this man, and for another to get up and say, I move to elect that one, to offer amendments, or substitutes in whole or in part?

Any man who does not like these nine is at liberty to offer nine others, or to strike out one and offer one other. It is free and open. No efforts have been made to cut off amendments or debate. Some gentlemen say that Mr. HENRY, the gentleman from Texas, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, had assumed authority. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas got the first start and made the first motion, and no other Member tried to make the same motion or made any other motion, who is to blame for it; and if he did commit an indiscretion, as my good friend Judge SHACKLEFORD suggests, was not the remedy suggested by the criticism indulged in here worse than the disease? Is it not worse to get up here and have a wash day, in the face of the derision of our ancient foes on the other side, than it is to submit to that when nobody objects to a single name on the list proposed by the resolution? [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is dangerous to have a wash day in the presence of the Republicans. I do not mean to insinuate that they would filch anything as small and insignificant as that, but there might be confusion, Mr. Speaker, and some of the linen might look dirty enough to appear familiar to them, and confusion of ownership might suggest identification and appropriation, and we would not like to get up troubles of that sort. Let me tell you the mistake my enthusiastic and conscientious and sensitive brethren made in jumping too heavily on Brother HENRY. One time when I was leading my young hopeful out by flowery paths and woodland ways a lizard ran up on my coat. My little fellow hauled off with a brick and hurled it at the lizard. He killed the lizard, but it almost killed me. [Laughter.] The correction was too severe for the evil; the treatment was too heroic for the disease. It is a "tempest in a teapot," "much ado about nothing," "great cry and little wool," "all fuzz and no feathers." Gentlemen made too much noise about the principle of the thing. Brother SHACKLEFORD was right in the beautiful speech he made this morning. It is admitted that all of these are good men; it is admitted that, no matter whom the gentleman from Texas consulted, he offered nine good names. He did not consult me, but I forgive him. [Laughter.] It was his mistake in judgment. Very often we feel that other gentlemen fail to exercise sufficient discretion in estimating our importance and our consultability, but I do not cherish that.

I believe the nearest way and the best way and the wisest way out of this is either to vote for these nine or to offer some others right here in the open, and if I do not offer to improve the list I am going to vote for the list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no necessity to refer everything to a Democratic caucus. The Democrats adopted the program of electing the standing committees, not because we were afraid to trust CHAMP CLARK with the naming of them. We did not believe that he would be as tyrannical a czar as the last three czars we have had, who were so naughty and bad in this House. We believe he would do well and right in every particular, but we were afraid when he got to be President that some Democrat of less ability and discretion might be Speaker, and could not do the job as well.

The evil aimed at was that the Speaker was, under the old plan, accused of packing committees, with a view to controlling legislation, and it was alleged that the favorites assigned to good committee places executed the wishes of the Speaker in promoting and suppressing legislation. We sought to correct that alleged evil by taking from the Speaker the appointment of the standing legislative committees. No such reason applied to the special committees incidentally or by routine raised from time to time in transacting the business of the House, so it was provided by rule, approved by the Democratic caucus, that when not otherwise provided by the House the Speaker should appoint special committees.

Now, in this case the House provided in a resolution that the committee of investigation should be elected by the House. That is what we are now doing, and if the minority will watch us right closely for a few minutes they will see us complete the election in fine form and in short order. When matters arise of sufficient importance, involving doubt or difference as to their merits, we refer them to the caucus.

But the Democratic caucus is too valuable an institution for us to abuse and weaken it by making it appear too common. To invoke its aid on trifling occasions and insignificant subjects might tend to cheapen and disparage its value and dignity. We do not claim that it is exactly sacred, but we regard it as essential to Democratic harmony and success, and we all know that they are essential to the political, material, and moral salvation of this country. Having completed the promised reforms in the organization of the House, the caucus will rarely be appealed to in the near future except for examining and lubricating the steam roller to make sure that it is kept in good order for use on an obstreperous minority. They used it so much and so indiscreetly before falling from their high estate in the majority to shrink into permanent position as the minority that it became rickety and disreputable. Several times it refused to work at all during the last Congress and recoiled on those who manipulated it so unwisely. We have repaired it and trained it to respond to the touch, execute good purposes, and run true and smooth to the appropriate obliteration of captious and partisan resistance to the people's will.

I have not meant to intimate that the Sugar Trust is unimportant. The caucus has given it attention and, if necessary, will give it more, which will result, we hope, in imprisonment of violators of the law, the removal of the differential on refined sugar, and a reduction of about 50 per cent in the duty on all sugar, thereby doubling the consumption of sugar without diminishing the revenue received therefrom for the Treasury.

I do contend, however, that the matter in hand is not of sufficient importance or doubt to demand a caucus. An investigation has been ordered. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], chairman of the committee which reported that resolution, regarded it as his duty to suggest a committee, and he was right about it. It was his duty to take the initiative, and I do not think he did wrong nor merited any criticism in pursuing the course he adopted. Everybody admits that the Members selected and suggested in his resolution are proper men for the duty in hand. Their names were proposed to the House for selection in an open, legitimate manner, just as any Member had a right to offer them. All other Members may participate in any way they choose in this election. I think, however, it is well to adopt the advice of Judge SHACKLEFORD, and attend to this matter right now by adopting the original resolution without regard to the help or hindrance offered from the other side. When Democrats are in doubt they will be wise to vote contrary to the propositions of the minority leader. That should become an axiom. If Brother HENRY did make any mistake, which I deny, you squeamish Democrats who criticize him would commit a greater blunder, if not a crime, to follow the misleading and disconcerting advice of the minority leader in preference to the counsels of Mr. HENRY. Now is the time to elect this committee, and it has been time for almost 24 hours. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am mighty sorry. I wish I had an hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this statement, especially in view of the fact that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON], a member of the Committee on Rules, is one of the gentlemen recommended by me for selection on this committee, and is not present. No Republican who has been named on either of the committees made application to me for appointment on the committee, and no Republican, whether named or not named, made application to me for recommendation for appointment on the committees, although I discussed the committee membership with such of them as I had a fair opportunity to do.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand my colleague desires to take the floor?

Mr. RAINEY. In my own right.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I thought possibly the House might prefer to have debate close on my motion. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, as a Democrat I feel under profound obligations to the other side of this House to-day. They have tendered us many suggestions as to the methods we ought to adopt in conducting the business of this House. We do not propose to accept any of them, and I am not under obligation to the gentlemen on the other side for the various suggestions of this character they have so kindly and in such a disinterested manner made. But I do feel obligated to them because their suggestions compel some of us on this side to feel reminiscent. I listened with considerable surprise to the ferocious address of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and as I listened I remembered another occasion not long ago during the life of the last Congress when he stood right over there at the left of the Speaker and subjected various Republicans on that side to a species of cross-examination. "What committees did you serve on before you incurred the enmity of the Speaker of this House?" "What committees are you serving on now?" And the effect of his cross-examination was to indicate to this side of the House and to the country that the Speaker of this House had been given too much power; that because certain Members on that side had incurred his enmity, by virtue of his power to select committees, he had as a disciplinary measure deprived them of their principal committee assignments, and to-day, to my surprise, I heard the same gentleman from his seat proclaiming that we ought to recur again to the old method of selecting committees; that we ought now to permit the Speaker of this House to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In its last analysis this question seems to have resolved itself largely into just a question of ethics. There is no objection on either side to the personnel of either of these important investigating committees. Everybody admits that good selections have been made, and on this side we are simply insisting, a good many of us, that they ought to have been submitted to the Democratic caucus—the selection, at least, of the Democratic members. On that side I do not know what you stand for. With the greatest pleasure the minority leader acquiesced in the selection of these committees, suggesting the Republican members, as he admits, as I understand it, without consulting any of those who were selected, at any rate without being requested by any of them and without being requested by anybody else. He simply assumed the power of a czar on that side and exercised that power in a perfectly Republican manner, in a manner against which the people of this country rebelled, and on account of which they repudiated the Republican Party at the polls at the last election. On this side the chairman of the Committee on Rules consulted, as he says, and as I believe and all of us believe, 150 Members or so, and finally suggested the very excellent committee which it is proposed now to elect. The trouble with the gentleman from Wisconsin is, and the trouble with most of those Members who wish to be called insurgent Members is, they thunder tremendously in the index, but when it comes to the essentials upon which the Republican Party stands—and they were overwhelmingly defeated on the essentials at the last election—they are always with the Republican Party, and in it with both feet.

Now, we do not care anything about the difference between a conference and a caucus. As I understand the difference, as explained by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], it is this: You can go into a conference and you are not bound by the action of the conference. You can go into a caucus and you are bound by it. In other words, the gentleman from Wisconsin and some of his associates can go into a conference on that side, discuss what they ought to do, and they can come out if they want to and vote against the majority of their party, and then they can go back to their constituents and get the votes of many Democrats and all the near Democrats because they insist they are standing for Democratic principles, and they get the votes of the Republicans because they insist that at the bottom, although they have made a big fuss about some absolutely immaterial question, at the bottom of it all they stand with the Republicans, and therefore these gentlemen in those near-Democratic districts come back to Congress and hold their places here. Why, as the result of the fight we had during the last session of Congress an unfriendly feeling developed on that side. It all grew out of the power of the Speaker to appoint committees, and the Speaker went to New York or Boston and is reported in the papers as saying some things that, at least, sounded unkind about the insurgent Members of this House. I refer to the former Speaker of this House.

He said that they were in rebellion; that there was not at that time a coherent majority in the House; that they were in rebellion; that they ought not be shot, as that was too honorable a death, but that they ought to be hung, because they were traitors. And we find these two gentlemen from Wisconsin standing here to-day advocating the very policies they branded and held out to the country that they were opposed to during the last session of Congress. There are no insurgent Members any longer. You are all together, and we know it.

This pretended fight over there can not divide the Democrats on this side. We are in favor of caucuses. We realize the fact that we are in a transition period at the present time, so far as the selection of committees is concerned. The Democrats have given to the Ways and Means Committee of this House the right to nominate the majority members of all the standing committees of the House, and we have brought those recommendations before a Democratic caucus; and I do not divulge secrets when I say that that Democratic caucus was more harmonious than any Republican caucus has been for the last 10 years.

Let me assure you, gentlemen, that there are no divisions on this side. We are not trying to get apart on this side. We are trying to get together, and the only discussion here has been a discussion as to what we can do that will enable us to get closer to the people. That is the discussion on this side. You have not any discussion of that kind on your side.

The minority leader admits and proclaims here most vigorously—and no one can proclaim more vigorously than he—that he is in favor of the method of selecting committees which in its last analysis gives to the Speaker the right to do it. Why, as a result of your pretended controversies on this matter last fall, we swept the country and our candidates were elected in order to get rid of a party which gave too much power to the Speaker. We are not going to follow your advice in that particular or in any other particular at the present time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have no trouble here in getting together. Those of you who were Members of the Sixty-first Congress remember the dissensions in that Congress which led to the Republican defeat in the last election.

And you new Members know why you are here. You are here because of dissensions in Republican ranks. The question submitted to you now is not a question of ethics, but the question submitted to-day is whether or not we will sustain the action of a Democratic committee of this House.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. BOOHER. Did not the gentleman from Texas expressly disclaim that his resolution was the result of the action of the Committee on Rules, and that he presented it here on his own individual motion and initiative?

Mr. RAINEY. I heard the statement made by the gentleman from Texas, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, and I heard him say that he consulted a great many Members, at least 150 on this side, in arriving at the conclusion as to who ought to be the Democratic members on that committee, but on that side the minority leader consulted none.

Mr. BOOHER. Now, the gentleman has said that the distinguished chairman has consulted 150 Democrats. He said that on the floor, but it is not in the RECORD.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not read the RECORD.

Mr. BOOHER. I have.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman will yield for a minute, I said that I consulted all the Democrats I could conveniently reach about this resolution, and, from first to last, in discussing the resolution and the personnel of the committee, I think I talked to at least 150, but to be conservative I put it "a great many of them," and I had no desire to overlook any Members. And there was no intention on my part of trying to assume any authority. I was simply endeavoring to settle this in behalf of the Democratic Party, and, therefore, in behalf of the country.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was stating that he was in favor of supporting the action of a Democratic committee. However, this motion does not come from the Committee on Rules, according to the statement of the gentlemen from Texas [Mr. HENRY] himself, the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RAINEY. I heard no protest from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I was greatly interested in the gentleman's observations as to selection of committees. I would like to know if he voted for the Democratic rule providing that all Democratic committees shall be appointed by the Speaker unless otherwise ordered by the House?

Mr. RAINEY. I voted for the rules adopted by this House.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman knows that is one of the rules?

Mr. RAINEY. I voted for and supported the idea that the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means should make recommendations to this caucus, and I supported and voted for the principle that, upon the question of selecting standing committees of this House, so far as the Democratic Members were concerned, the Democratic caucus should prevail.

We believe in caucuses on this side. It is the way to bring about united Democratic action. We believe if 10 or 12 Members on this side of the House are not in accord with the rest of them, are not in accord with the other 200 and more, that the other 200 or more that attend that caucus come nearer being the Democratic Party than the 10 or 12 who do not agree with them, and so we all get together. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, on account of your personal interests, you Republican insurgents who come from the Northwest, including both gentlemen from Wisconsin, you proceed upon the theory that you must keep up the pretense of opposing vigorously the action of your party in nonessentials. We gave you the opportunity—the Committee on Ways and Means did—of acting as a separate organization in this House. We were willing at any time to recognize you and appoint from your number the minority members to which you are entitled. Although you opposed vigorously the old method of selecting members of these committees, you crawled back into the Republican caucus and abided by the result of that caucus, and without protest you let the minority leader suggest the Republican membership of all committees and of this particular committee. You are not objecting here even now. The trouble with the insurgent Republican Members of this House is that they are simply fighting to get Democratic votes and near-Democratic votes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is aware that his Democratic rules now provide for the appointment of select committees by the Speaker?

Mr. RAINEY. Well, the Democratic caucus proposes hereafter in important matters to select the select committees, and if they are selected by the Speaker, the Speaker having already taken his position on that question, he will do it after consultation with the Democratic caucus.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. A few minutes ago, while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] was on the floor, I wanted to ask a question. There seems to be a difficulty about a difference in terms without any difference in substance. I want to suggest to the gentleman that as I understand the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] it is that after consultation he offered this resolution as a Representative of the eleventh district of Texas, but that he does and did know that all the members of his committee indorsed the resolution and agreed with him about it.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman for his suggestions in this connection.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who interrupted me a while ago, gave to the Democrats some excellent advice. He advised them, in effect, if I understood his advice, that the Democratic Party would go on the rocks if they depended upon caucus action. He further advised us that it is not yet too late for us to change our opinion and return to the old system which he himself denounced during the last Congress. We do not intend to do it. We intend that the majority shall continue to rule.

These investigating committees are not important, in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not believe under the present law, as construed by the Supreme Court, that the time will ever come when the Supreme Court of the United States will hold that any other corporation than the Standard Oil organization is in "unreasonable" restraint of trade. There are no teeth in this resolution we are considering now. I know there are no teeth in it, because it seems to meet with the unanimous approval of the Republican side of this House.

I want to say to gentlemen on the other side that there will come a time in the future—if this special committee finds that it can not investigate things which the people of this country want investigated—I say there will come a time when there will be an investigation that will have teeth in it, and we do not expect to have it receive the support of the minority members of the Committee on Rules or the minority members of any other committee in this House. We propose on this side to investigate the thieves who are at the head of the Sugar Trust, and I am afraid you can not do it under this resolution. The only thing that this resolution does is to find out, after taking evidence, whether or not there is a trust and suggests means of prosecuting it, to investigate the evidence which everybody knows already exists. This investigation ought not to last very long, and its results, in view of the recent action of the Supreme Court of the United States, will not be important.

I have been something of a prosecutor on this floor, in Sugar Trust matters, and I want to corroborate what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated when he said that he furnished me with much important material which I used in my speeches, although he represents that district in New York in which is located a great plant for sugar refining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Arbuckle plant.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; the Arbuckle plant. I have made a number of speeches on this floor in relation to this matter. We all know there is a Sugar Trust. We all know and the country knows that the directors of that Sugar Trust stole from the Government thousands of dollars a day for years. The country knows it because the directors have admitted that they did it. They admitted that they kept in their Wall Street office a set of books bound in red and another set in black; one set representing the incorrect weights on the Government scales and the other set representing the correct weights on the city scales. So they knew every day how much they had stolen, and they knew when they had stolen the $5,000,000, of which they refunded a part. The entire country knew it, and the country knows that the period for prosecuting these millionaire Sugar Trust directors, who are no longer merely millionaire directors but millionaire thieves, will end in November, 1912, when the statute of limitations becomes a complete bar, and while the present Attorney General of the United States still occupies his position.

I have not introduced any Sugar Trust resolution at this session because I have appeared so vigorously on this floor in the rôle of a prosecutor of the Sugar Trust, but if this investigation does not take the direction of bringing out evidence as to who these millionaire thieves are that stole the money, I propose myself to introduce a resolution, and have a Democratic caucus pass upon it as to whether or not it ought to be submitted to this House, and a committee appointed under it to investigate the stealing by these thieves. That is what we are after.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Then, as I understand the gentleman, this resolution is in the nature of an exploratory investigation and not of much importance?

Mr. RAINEY. I understand this investigation is for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a Sugar Trust, the effect it has upon sugar in raising prices, its effect in crushing out competitors, and for the purpose of suggesting remedies and amendments to laws now on the statute book in order to reach this trust.

Mr. SIMS. Why not amend it so as to get what the gentleman from Illinois desires?

Mr. RAINEY. The resolution has been adopted by this House. We are now selecting a committee to investigate under the resolution, and that is all.

Mr. SIMS. I do not see any use in having two investigations if one will do the work.

Mr. RAINEY. If this does the work it is satisfactory. If it does not do the work, I will introduce another resolution and insist upon getting at the bottom of the Sugar Trust thefts.

Mr. SIMS. Then I understand this is only an exploratory resolution.

Mr. RAINEY. It does not purport to be merely that; it purports to be what I have stated.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. It may be broad enough to investigate these thefts. I sincerely hope it will. If it is not broad enough there will be a resolution introduced that will be broad enough. I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to state that everybody knew there was a Sugar Trust, and that there was no question but that there was a Sugar Trust——

Mr. RAINEY. I will make an exception——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. And later there will be a resolution introduced with teeth in it to investigate the thieves at the head of that trust.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; I did say that.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. If the gentleman knows there is a Sugar Trust, and if at some time there is going to be a resolution introduced that will mean something, why not introduce a resolution now that will mean something?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I will make an exception in favor of the gentleman from Oklahoma. Perhaps he does not know there is a Sugar Trust. I am not responsible for the things the gentleman from Oklahoma does not know, thank God. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Well, the gentleman from Oklahoma did not say——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Oklahoma did not say that he did or did not know that there was a Sugar Trust.

Mr. RAINEY. Does the gentleman know it?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I do not know anything about it. I believe there is, and I think I know as much about it as the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, a great many Members of Congress have, during a long period of service, been studying this question, but the gentleman from Oklahoma is the only man I have ever heard who is willing to admit that after serving here for eight years he does not know anything about it. We are not going on the rocks——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. If the gentleman knows it, why does he not introduce his important resolution or his resolution which he states will have teeth in it now without delay? I am just as anxious to have the Sugar Trust investigated as anybody, not excepting the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman for his conversion to Democratic ideas and ideals.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Is that a conversion?

Mr. RAINEY. And I hope it will last long enough so that he can help us get some of these fellows in jail who ought to be there. Submit one of your own to investigate the Sugar Trust, if it is in harmony with the Republican principles for which you stand. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If it is a resolution with plenty of teeth in it, I will support it most vigorously upon this floor.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I would submit one, if I believed for a moment that the gentleman would support anything coming from this side, no matter how meritorious.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I seldom see anything meritorious coming from that side, and I never have seen anything with real merit come from the gentleman from Oklahoma. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I am not responsible for the many things that the gentleman does not see and the many good things that the gentleman does not understand. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAINEY. Well, you can not see something that is not there. Now, we are not going to go upon the rocks, and the gentleman from Wisconsin need have no fear on that point. In future the sentiment seems to be unanimous on this side of the House to submit matters of this kind to a Democratic caucus. I hope not to a Ways and Means Committee, which is already burdened with too much work. Gentlemen may expect that to occur in the future, and those gentlemen on that side who are congratulating themselves upon a division in the ranks on this side will find this side, I think, marching solidly shoulder to shoulder at the present time and at all times in the future under Democratic banners. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We propose, after having given out this warning to the chairmen of all committees of this House, after having given this warning on this floor, to support this most excellent resolution [applause on the Democratic side] and to put it through. You have not found any fault whatever with the Democratic members on this committee as proposed by this resolution, and we have not found any fault with them either, and we have not found any fault with the Republican members, and I have not heard any Member on that side find any fault with them. We have occupied now many hours in the discussion of this question, and we propose now to support this resolution because it is tendered by a chairman of an important committee of this House. If we had any fault to find with any of these members, you need not be afraid, any of you, we would make the motion on this floor to amend this resolution and to submit the name of some one else. If you have any fault to find with it, why do you not do the same thing, but you say this committee must be selected by a special committee here of 15. To be appointed how? By the Speaker of the House, an indirect way of having this committee selected by the Speaker, an indirect way of doing that which has been most overwhelmingly repudiated by the people at the polls.

We are electing them now from the floor. Hereafter we will elect the Democratic members of committees from this floor, and we will do it after submitting the whole question to a Democratic caucus of this House. Then we will come in and elect them. That is the way we propose to do it in the future in important matters, just as we select now members of standing committees and——

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman who interrupts me now has contributed much in this House—more than any other one man—to bring about the present state of facts with reference to the selection of standing committees. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMS. I want to say, simply, that I heartily agree with what the gentleman is saying, and I hope the assurances the gentleman gives will be literally carried out. But how can the gentleman, myself, or anybody else prevent gentlemen getting up on the floor of the House and making a suggestion, by way of a motion, as to what men shall go on committees and force a vote, if it is a matter of privilege?

Mr. RAINEY. We may not be able to prevent it, but we expect to select these important committees in caucus hereafter; and I notice that those Members on this side of the House and Members on that side who have opposed the resolution of the chairman of the Rules Committee have almost universally been those Members who are in favor of permitting the Speaker to select the committees. But just at the present time they happen to be in the minority on this side, and I thought they were in the minority on that side, but they do not seem to be.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. RAINEY. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understood that gentleman rightly, he—speaking for himself and, as he believes, voicing the sentiment of this side of the House—states that the present rule, which makes it the duty of the Speaker to appoint select committees, will be abrogated, so that they will be selected by the House as a result of caucus action.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I think the rule in terms states that they are to be selected by the Speaker, but the Speaker will do it after consulting with the caucus.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am simply asking the gentleman——

Mr. RAINEY. I think the rule is that they be selected by the Speaker "unless otherwise provided."

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, is it the gentleman's idea that it shall in all instances be otherwise provided?

Mr. RAINEY. Well, it looks to me like the sentiment of this House is in favor of a Democratic caucus hereafter being consulted in the matter of selecting the majority members of important special committees.

Mr. SHERLEY. I just wanted to get the gentleman's position plainly stated.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has a right to his conclusions in the same matter. I only speak for myself, and my judgment is not any better and usually not as good as the gentleman's——

Mr. SHERLEY. I thank the gentleman for his compliment, but I simply wanted to get the gentleman's position accurately stated.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks with considerable authority on that side of the House and I have the greatest respect for his opinion. He has stated how in the future select committees would be appointed through a Democratic caucus.

Mr. RAINEY. I have given my opinion in reference to it; that is all, I will say to my colleague.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but I think the gentleman speaks with considerable authority. I wish to ask, so that we may not get into this condition again about the proposition, whether he thought that same condition would apply to the appointment of conference committees. The rule in reference to select committees and conference committees is the same rule. The gentleman intimated perhaps hereafter select committees would be selected by the Democratic caucus. Will the conference committees also be selected by a Democratic conference?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not care to discuss that phase of it. The question may come on some time in the future, but the important question now from the standpoint of Democrats who have just won a tremendous victory at the polls, the important thing now is to stand together shoulder to shoulder in this House [applause on the Democratic side], and prove to the country that although we may differ here in matters of ethics that when it comes to action the Democratic Party is united. We do not propose to go upon the rocks. You did that in the last Congress by not being united. We are united now, and I simply suggest, it is my opinion only, that we proceed now to elect this committee, the personnel of which is all right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The personnel of the committee is all right. The methods to be adopted hereafter we can determine when the time comes, and, speaking for myself, I can say I do not believe it will be done in this manner. I know the difficulties the chairman of a committee has in suggesting appointments to any committee. I have had some experience myself, and I want to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, for the excellent selections he has made for the Democratic side of this committee. Now, I do not desire to take up more time, and I yield the balance of whatever time I may have left to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask how much time there is remaining.

The SPEAKER. There are 20 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House to any great extent. I will say the position of the majority of this House with reference to the selection of committees is clearly and fully defined in the rules of this House adopted by it on the motion of the majority. The Democratic Party stands for the selection of the standing committees in this House by the House, and so far as this party action is concerned, it stands for the selection of those committees by a party caucus recommended by one of the standing committees of the House.

Now, as to the special committees of the House, it would simply be absurd to say that every special committee that this House has to appoint shall be selected by the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The rules we have adopted recognize that absurdity. Do you want the House to stop in its proceedings every time a conference report comes in here and go into the election of three men on a conference committee? It would be a matter of absurdity. It would waste the valuable time of this House, costing the country thousands of dollars.

Now, what have we done in our rules? We have said that a special committee, like the committees being selected to-day, reported by a conference and by minor committees, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House, unless the House determines otherwise. Now, what do we do?

The rules made by that side of the House in the last decade gave absolute power to the Speaker to appoint the special committees of this House and did not give the House the right to take that power away from him under any circumstances. The gentleman from Wisconsin, who sits before me, knows that it took a resolution in this House on one occasion within the last two years to take the power away from him. Now we have met that sentiment. We have said that the Speaker shall have the right to appoint these necessary but largely unimportant committees in order that the business of the House may be expedited; but when a matter of great importance comes before this House, a matter in which the personnel of the committee may mean great things to the American people, this House has the power by resolution of the committee to take the right of appointment away from the Speaker and elect its own committees.

Now, we expect in the future, so far as the special committees of the House are concerned, committees that are unimportant, or committees possibly sometimes of importance, where there is no real division, to go on and allow the Speaker to appoint them, realizing that at any time we have the power on the floor of this House to reach to that desk and take the power of appointment away from the Speaker. It is an orderly way in which to do business, and that is the way the country wants us to do business.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the plan which I understand has been adopted, and to which the gentleman has referred, who is to decide on that side as to when such a situation is reached of sufficient importance as to demand or require the action by the House rather than by the Speaker?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The House itself. The House decides in this case.

Mr. MONDELL. But it was not the House that offered this resolution, but a member of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has been asleep for a week or two. He should wake up. Within four or five days the Rules Committee brought a resolution before this House providing for the selection of a committee to investigate the Sugar Trust.

If they had brought that resolution in here and said nothing about the appointment of the committee, under the rules of the House the power to appoint the committee would have rested in the hands of the Speaker of the House. But that resolution in so many terms provided that the House should select the committee. Therefore, by the action of the House, in accordance with the rule which says that the Speaker shall appoint unless the House directs otherwise, in compliance with the terms of that rule, the House by that resolution directed otherwise, and the matter is now before the House for action.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, just one more question. I am not quite as wide awake as my genial friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I am sufficiently awake for the perception of some things. I want to remind the gentleman that the nomination of a committee by a chairman of a committee of the House is equivalent to the selection of the committee by that chairman, and not by the House, and the gentleman well knows that; so that while you have possibly followed the form of your resolution, yet as a matter of fact the committee is to be appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I was coming to that. I simply wanted to state the situation under the rules of the House. And I want to say that in the future, so far as I am concerned, in most cases I think it advisable for the Speaker to exercise the power of appointing the small special committees and thus not delay the House in the consideration or the appointment of those committees. But other cases may arise in the future—a case arises now—where the House may feel that it should exercise the power of appointment or election itself. Now, it is written in the rule that the majority may at any time exercise that power and elect a committee. Now, as to the election of these particular committees, I think it is wiser, as a family affair concerning those on this side of the House, for us to go into the caucus and select the men that we want to represent us on the committees of the House, because there is more freedom of debate in our caucus and less discord when we go into the family caucus and select our own men.

Now, I am perfectly willing to accord that right to the other side. So far as I am concerned, I will say to gentlemen on the Republican side, I do not desire to cross that aisle for a moment and attempt to dictate to your side how you shall select the men who go on the important committees of this House to represent you. If it is the sentiment on your side that one man shall select the minority membership, so be it. You are responsible to the country for what you do. We are not. If you want to elect them by caucus, do so, and we will recognize your action. There can not come any complaint from this side of the House as to that. For the first time in the history of this Government the majority of the House of Representatives has said to the minority, "Name your men on the committees of this House." [Applause on the Democratic side.] And we have elected them without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to ask the gentleman this question: Is the Speaker to be censured for simply waiving what he has the right to do and submitting it to the House? Is he not to be commended for it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Speaker did not surrender it. The House took it away from the Speaker by a resolution brought in here on the floor of the House. The Speaker did not surrender it. The House itself brought in a resolution before this House and said the Speaker should not appoint the committees.

Now, as to this resolution I want to say this: I think, with respect to important special committees that the House desires to select, that it is probably wiser for us in the future to go into a caucus and let the caucus determine the action, where we can all get together and have absolute freedom of action.

There is no complaint against the personnel of this committee, either coming from that side or from this side. The resolution has been offered, there is no gag rule, everybody has had a chance to get up and take the floor, and any man that has had the floor yesterday or to-day could have moved to strike any name from this resolution that he wanted to and put another in its place. Now, when this resolution has been under debate for a day and there has no man arisen in his place and moved to strike a name from the list and substitute another in its place, I say to you that the time has come to act; the time has come for this side of the House to pass this resolution as offered by the gentleman from Texas and vote down the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. Personally I am not so concerned about the form in which this is presented. I believe there is no objection to the personnel of the committee, but there has been from quite a reliable source a serious attack on the resolution itself. I wish the gentleman would take a moment's time and give us the benefit of his investigation of the resolution as to whether or not it will accomplish anything, because if the resolution is inoperative and of no effect, it would materially affect my vote and, I think, the votes of some other Members.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the resolution itself has been passed and has been a law for a week.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the rush of other business I have not given the resolution that careful consideration which I otherwise would. I am not very familiar with its terms. It may not go as far as you or I might desire it to go, but it certainly goes to this extent, and there is no question about it: It sends out a committee of this House to determine whether the Sugar Trust is standing in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. If that committee comes back and reports that it is, and the majority of this House adopts that report, it puts the executive branch of this Government on notice that something must be done. [Applause.] Therefore I think it is well worth our going into.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give me a moment to explain my position?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish to make a statement as to my position, that it may be put before the House. I am not complaining that I have had no opportunity to be heard on the floor on this matter, and I am not objecting to the personnel of this committee.

But I want to say that certain influential people in my State were very desirous that I should be consulted in the make-up of this committee. They felt that they had a large interest at stake in this question, and I was assured by those that I thought in a position to give me the assurance that I would be consulted. I told them that it was imperative that I should be. I assured these gentlemen from my State that I would be consulted, and now I am placed in a position before them of not having been consulted, and perhaps of not having sufficient influence or standing as a Democratic Member of the House to be consulted in a matter in which my State was vitally interested. That is what I am complaining about. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that I think the wiser course to pursue where the right of selection of committees falls to the House is to carry the matter to a caucus, and I believe that will be the course pursued hereafter.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman can understand my position, and will see that Democratic Members can not afford to be put in such an embarrassing position as to be represented at home as not having sufficient influence to be consulted about important matters affecting their State.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not take that view of it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to say that I do not know whether the gentleman from Colorado refers to me as not having conferred with him or not.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I did not know that the gentleman or his committee was going to have anything to do with it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I say to the House candidly that the gentleman's colleague, Mr. TAYLOR, spoke to me about this matter and requested that I take certain action. I considered the Colorado delegation in making up this committee, and at one time the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] was to be a member of this committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Would the gentleman allow me to make an observation that fits in there, because what the gentleman has just stated is indeed news to me? I never knew until this moment that I had been considered at all as a possible member of this committee, and I want to say in that connection, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman, that while the beet-sugar interests of Colorado, who want a sweeping investigation made, did want me to be a member of that committee, I did not myself want to be a member, because I felt I had my hands full of other work, with a War Department investigation ahead, but I am still more astonished that I was not consulted about it, when the gentleman says that at one time I was tentatively decided upon as a member of this committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will simply say that I did consult some of the Colorado gentlemen, and did the best I could. We put on a Representative from the Pacific coast to represent the beet-sugar industry and interests. There was no personal intention of overlooking the gentleman or anyone who should have been consulted on account of his district, State, or the constituency he represents.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a short statement?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; though my time is almost up.

Mr. MANN. I have three minutes left, and I will yield them to the gentleman if necessary. I think it is fair to state to the House, and nothing improper about it, on this question of the beet-sugar interests, that several gentlemen spoke to me from the Democratic side of the House, from the so-called insurgent side of this side of the House, and the so-called regulars of this side of the House, suggesting that in making recommendations I should put on a beet-sugar man—in other words, some one representing a beet-sugar district or a State, which I did in naming Mr. FORDNEY, the gentleman from Michigan. I think that one of the suggestions came from the gentleman who is now named for chairman of the committee, and possibly also from the gentleman who introduced the resolution, Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I merely have to say this: This House has had absolute free consideration of this committee. As I said before, no man on that side of the House, although they have had the floor and every opportunity to do so, has risen in his seat and moved to strike out a name and put the name of some one else in.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is not for a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. That opportunity has not been presented as yet, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is not advised as to the parliamentary situation. His side of the floor has had ample opportunity whenever they have had the floor to move to amend this resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. On the contrary, the Speaker ruled that no Member had, while another motion taking precedence had the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the resolution that took precedence came from that side of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it came from the other side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only amendment pending is the amendment offered by the leader of the minority. It comes from that side of the Chamber.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will permit that point to be cleared up, I am sure. The motion to refer by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] was withdrawn, and immediately after it was withdrawn a motion to have a committee appointed by a select committee took its place, and has shut off the motion which will come later to substitute one name for another.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The motion that shut off the amendment did not come from us; it came from the leader of the minority.

Mr. MURDOCK. However, it did preclude the motion to strike out, which may come later.

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest, unless the previous question is ordered the opportunity will be presented.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we have had two days of debate on this question, or a part of yesterday and to-day, and I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question is now moved, is a motion to strike out and insert precluded?

The SPEAKER. If a motion for the previous question is adopted, undoubtedly it precludes amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, Mr. Speaker, I demand the ayes and nays on ordering the previous question.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. As to the resolution or motion before the House, I just understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] to say that the motion now before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to have a select committee to investigate appointed by a committee to be appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand the motion now before the House, it is to refer the resolution of the gentleman from Texas to a select committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think the debate has gone as far as it ought to in this matter, but, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I am willing to withdraw the demand for the previous question. If the House will agree by unanimous consent to allow debate to be closed now and amendments to be offered striking out names, I will withdraw my motion for the previous question——

Mr. MURDOCK. I object to that.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it is in order for the gentleman to move the previous question on the pending motion without making it apply to the resolution——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, my purpose is——

Mr. MANN. That would cut off debate on the proposition which I have offered without affecting the right to amend, if my motion is not agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois this proposition has been under debate for some time, but of course I have no desire to cut off debate on the gentleman's resolution——

Mr. MANN. But I have no objection to the gentleman moving the previous question on my resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I will say this, that I do not desire to cut off the gentleman from Kansas from moving to strike out a name and inserting some other name, but I think the time has come when this debate should be closed.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Alabama will simply move the previous question on the pending motion, which is my motion, that will not affect the right to amend the original resolution if the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it will not cut off debate on the original motion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a motion for unanimous consent to this effect, that the gentleman from Kansas be allowed to offer an amendment to strike out whatever name or names he may desire and insert others, and that debate be now closed and that the House vote at once on the resolution and all pending amendments.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think that would hardly be fair to propose new names without the right of discussion either for or against them, and hence I would be obliged to object to that request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As far as the offering of amendments is concerned, you have had the opportunity; we are willing to give it to you now by unanimous consent. If you are not willing to take it, I move the previous question on the resolution and all amendments thereto to its final passage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If the motion of the gentleman from Alabama carries will it be in order for me to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I move an amendment now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not move the previous question on the original resolution while there is pending a motion to refer a resolution to a committee; that he can only move the previous question upon the motion pending before the House at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like for the gentleman to cite his authority for that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Let the Chair cite that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the gentleman has not it to cite.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois has any authority to cite, the Chair would like to hear it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not able at present to lay my hands upon the authority. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But the Speaker will remember that the motion for the previous question does not apply, although made and carried, to a subsequent motion to recommit, and if the gentleman from Alabama had moved the previous question upon the resolution it would still have been in order for me to move, after the previous question was ordered, both before and after, under the rule, to recommit, and that motion is not affected by the operation of the previous question already ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not take any issue with the gentleman on the question to recommit.

Mr. MANN. A motion to recommit and a motion to commit are the same thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are recognized in a different attitude under the rules of this House.

Mr. MANN. I think not. A motion to refer, a motion to commit, and a motion to recommit are all the same thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We will decide the question of a motion to recommit when we get to it. I am not so sure that on this resolution the gentleman has the right. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I have made the motion, under the rules, to commit this resolution to a committee. The rule provides that the motion can be made either before or after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not prevent the previous question applying to both motions.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the Chair will indulge me I will read from Rule XVII, which refers directly to this kind of a situation:

> There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of Members voting, if a quorum be present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments, and include the bill to its passage or rejection.

Now, when the previous question is ordered we vote on the gentleman's motion and vote on the resolution to every pending amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, that has been decided a number of times. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it says that the motion may apply to the main question and to a pending motion to refer. If the Chair will look at Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, section 5466, he will find it has been very clearly decided.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs the indulgence of the House for just a moment. The Chair is not at all certain but that he misled the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] or misled himself—he does not know which. When the gentleman from Kansas rose and asked if the amendment that he wants to offer now was in order, the parliamentary situation was that the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to refer the resolution of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] was pending. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] rose and asked that if a motion to substitute a name would be in order at that time, and the Chair replied it would not. Subsequently the motion to refer was withdrawn and that left a new situation.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the Speaker of the House will indulge me for just a moment, I think he has stated the proposition correctly up to that point. But the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi was withdrawn at the time that the gentleman from Illinois had the floor, and in the midst of the gentleman's speech, and as soon as it was withdrawn the gentleman from Illinois, having the floor, at once presented another motion, which precluded the right of anybody else to strike out a name and insert another.

The SPEAKER. That is precisely true.

Mr. MURDOCK. That completes the whole statement, then, correctly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Speaker, that this side is perfectly willing to give unanimous consent for his order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken and there were—yeas 139, nays 80, answered "present" 13, not voting 153, as follows:

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2183. An act to authorize change in construction of barracks and other necessary buildings for mobile troops in the Hawaiian Islands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION FROM SELECT COMMITTEE—UNITED STATES STEEL INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1911.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Not anticipating that any business would be transacted by the House yesterday beyond the debate upon the resolution providing for the approval of the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, I withdrew from the Hall to attend to other matters. During my absence the House paid me the compliment of a unanimous election to membership on the select committee provided for by House resolution 148, for the investigation of the affairs of the United States Steel Corporation and other corporations. That election, coming without solicitation or suggestion from me, I very much appreciate, but I find that the resolution includes, by name, the Pennsylvania Steel Co. and calls for an inquiry whether it has any relations or affiliations in violation of law, with the so-called Steel Corporation.

The Pennsylvania Steel Co. is located in my district. I have no financial interest in it of any kind and have never represented it professionally or in any other way. I have, however, a great interest in its welfare because so many of my constituents are dependent upon it for support and some of its officers are my warm personal friends. I do not believe that it has any relations or affiliations in violation of law with the United States Steel Corporation or anybody else, but it will avoid any appearance of partiality if the finding to that effect be made by others than myself. I therefore beg to be excused from service upon the committee.

Very respectfully, M. E. OLMSTED.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. SHEPPARD, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. SLEMP, for 10 days, on account of illness.

Mr. PARRAN, for one week, on account of illness in family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers with the bill H. R. 11975, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 4 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Thursday, May 18, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Doc. No. 57); to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

House joint memorial 3.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas the Territory of Alaska is settled by a hardy, active, and energetic people, numbering more than 64,000, according to the Thirteenth Census, 1910, who have in the last 10 years added in gold and fish alone more than $225,000,000 to the wealth of the Nation, and whose trade with the merchants of the United States last year amounted to more than $52,000,000, being greater than our trade with China and twice as great in value as the trade with the Philippines; and

Whereas the development of the Territory is being greatly retarded by the want of a lawmaking or legislative body therein to be elected by the people:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Washington (the Senate concurring), That the Legislature of Washington does hereby declare its most earnest opinion that it is necessary to the development of the Pacific coast and of the resources and good government in Alaska that Congress shall, at the earliest possible date, pass an enabling act creating and providing for the organization of a Territorial legislature in Alaska, to be elected by the American citizens resident therein, with such powers and limitations as have been usually given to and imposed upon such legislative assemblies in other Territories; and the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Washington are hereby requested to aid and assist in the securing of the passage of such a bill.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forthwith transmitted to the Senators from the State of Washington and to each Congressman from the State of Washington; also to each member of the Committees on the Territories of the House of Representatives and the Senate for their information in the premises.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have consulted with various Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and as the Committee on Finance is holding protracted and regular meetings there seems to be no urgency so far as the business of the Senate is concerned. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a number of Senators have inquired as to the taking up of Senate resolution No. 6, a resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER. I will say at this time, in order that Senators who desire to be here may have the opportunity, that I shall ask the Senate to take up that resolution on Monday at the close of the morning business.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT PRAIRIE DU CHIEN.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 850. It is what is ordinarily known as a bridge bill, and there is necessity for its early disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 850) to amend an act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa," approved June 6, 1874, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to so amend the act approved June 6, 1874, legalizing and declaring a lawful structure the pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, Wis., as to permit its rebuilding and relocation, with pontoon draw openings, in the two channels of the river of shorter length; but the bridge shall be rebuilt in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable streams," approved March 23, 1906.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PEND OREILLE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 144) to legalize a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, in Stevens County, Wash. There is a necessity for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Idaho & Washington Northern Railway Co., a corporation of the State of Idaho, its successors and assigns, to maintain and operate a bridge and approaches thereto now constructed across the Pend Oreille River, at or near where said river flows through Box Canyon in Stevens County, in the State of Washington, such maintenance and operation to be subject to, and in accordance with, the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That, in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, the bridge as built provides suitable and proper facilities for present and prospective navigation, and is in all respects satisfactory to navigation interests; and if, in their judgment, any changes in said bridge are necessary to meet the aforesaid conditions, such changes shall be immediately made by the said company at its own expense: Provided further, That drawings showing the plans and location of the said bridge as built shall be filed in the War Department within 30 days of the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUTHORITY OVER WATER POWER IN STATES.

Mr. JONES. Senate resolution 44, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the Senate upon the power and authority of the National Government over the development and use of water power within the respective States, went over yesterday at the request of the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I understand that he has no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I withdraw any objections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution submitted yesterday by him. It will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The first bill on the calendar will be stated.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, in furtherance of the notice he gave yesterday, the Senator from South Dakota is about to resume his speech.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the RECORD will show that he is speaking upon House joint resolution No. 1.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, at the time of the adjournment yesterday I was calling attention to some of the advantages which the Canadian people enjoy through discriminatory legislation, which has the effect of protective legislation.

The Dominion has become one of the greatest cheese-producing countries in the world by means of Government subsidies. She is also, I understand, building grain elevators for her grain farmers. She has a system of patent laws which have the force and effect of high-protective tariff laws, because a patent becomes void within two years from its date unless within that time the patentee, or his legal representatives, commence and continuously carry on in Canada the construction or manufacturing of the patented invention; and should the patentee, or his legal representatives, after 12 months from the date of his patent, import or cause to be imported into Canada his invention, the patent shall be void as to his interest therein.

The Canadian farmer has another advantage over the American farmer in that the Canadian consumer enjoys the benefit of the British preferential tariff under which manufactures of Great Britain are admitted at 33⅓ per cent less than the rate imposed upon other nations. The tariff in the United States upon the manufactured articles that the American farmer must buy is from 25 per cent to nearly 50 per cent more than the British preferential tariff which the Canadian farmer pays. I have seen it stated during these debates that on rubber boots and shoes and on rubber coats the Canadian pays 15 per cent duty and the American 35 per cent; on jute bags the Canadian pays 15 per cent and the American 45 per cent; on a sewing machine the Canadian pays 20 per cent and the American 30 per cent; on a kitchen stove the Canadian pays 15 per cent and the American 45 per cent; on dress goods the Canadian pays 15 per cent and the American 60 per cent; on wire the Canadian pays 10 cents and the American 75 cents per 100 pounds; on his hat the Canadian pays 20 per cent and the American 55 per cent; on his underwear the Canadian pays 22½ per cent and the American 45 per cent; all because of the preferential rate between Canada and the great manufacturing country of Great Britain. This is a very unjust and unfair proposal we are asked to consider, Mr. President. It will injure the American farmer. It will not reduce prices to the American consumer unless it be upon news-print paper. It will be of substantial benefit to many of the great trusts and monopolies of the United States. I have said that the farmer is an independent unit, who creates wealth and does not issue watered stock nor enter into contracts in restraint of trade. I can not say that of many of the beneficiaries who will profit by the passage of this law should it be enacted.

The creation of enormous fortunes by the issuance of stocks in corporations for so-called good will and the exaction of prices sufficient to pay large dividends upon this kind of capital are the greatest abuses of the age. Take, for example, the tin-plate and steel industries. When the different tin-plate manufacturers gave options on their several plants, it was for an agreed cash price. The manufacturer could take that price in cash or an equal amount in preferred stock in the new company, and if he took preferred stock, he got an equal amount of common stock as a bonus. Nearly all took stock for their plants instead of cash. When they fixed the price on their plants they estimated the good will, together with the managerial talent and the organization of each concern, worth as much as the tangible property.

For instance, if the tangible property in a given plant were $250,000, the organization, good will, and talent was estimated at a like value, or more, $250,000, making the agreed price $500,000; for this the owner would receive in preferred stock in the trust $500,000, and as a pure bonus he would receive in common stock $500,000 more, making in all an issue of $1,000,000 stock in payment for a plant whose tangible property was worth only $250,000.

According to "The Inside History of the Carnegie Steel Co." by Mr. James H. Bridge, the actual value of the various plants put into the American Tin Plate Trust, including organization, good will, and talent, was about $12,000,000. It is said that the Moores raised about $5,000,000 cash as working capital for the trust and received $5,000,000 in preferred and $5,000,000 in common stock. Eighteen millions preferred and $18,000,000 common were issued, and then an extra $10,000,000 of common was issued and divided up among the promoters, making $28,000,000 common in all. A monopoly was created and competition in the manufacture of tin plate ceased. It went from $2.65 per box in January, 1899, to $4.65 per box in the following October. Two years later the concern was taken over by the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. President, the American farmer has created enormous wealth in the aggregate; but each farmer did his share as an independent working unit; there are no millionaires among them. The farmer has not learned the art of creating wealth out of nothing.

In the process of merging the Tin Plate Trust with the United States Steel Corporation its capitalization of $46,000,000 was converted into $60,000,0000 of stock in the Steel Trust. Probably the largest actual investment of capital ever made in the tin-plate business was the $5,000,000 in cash turned in by the promoters.

Take as another instance of this kind of stock watering the National Steel Co. and the American Steel Hoop Co., which, history tells us, issued $51,000,000 of common stock that was all good will, but when these concerns were merged into the Steel Trust, that good will capitalization was increased.

Then came Mr. John W. Gates, with his Consolidated Steel & Wire Co. and auxiliary companies, capitalized at about $5,000,000; these were merged into the American Steel & Wire Co. of Illinois, capitalized at twenty-four millions, and in 1899 taken into the American Steel & Wire Co. of New Jersey, with a capitalization of ninety millions. That in its turn was absorbed by the United States Steel and its capitalization increased in the usual way in the process.

Then came Morgan and Gates with a merger of the Minnesota Iron Co., the Illinois Steel Co., and the Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Railway Co. into the Federal Steel Co., capitalized, under quite similar methods, at about $50,000,000.

Then there was the Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines, a Rockefeller concern, which was taken over by the Steel Trust, in which process its less than thirty millions of capital stock were exchanged for eighty-one millions of the capital stock of the Steel Trust. But this is not all—there remains the marvelous story of securing monopolistic control of the Lake Superior ores, whereby, upon a mere loan of half a million dollars, for which he held security from the Oliver Mining Co., Mr. Carnegie got into the ore business and finally secured absolute control of the Oliver, the Rockefeller, and the Hill ores, which Mr. Schwab estimates to be 500,000,000 tons of picked quality of ore, upon which the Steel Trust can reckon a profit of from $2 to $2.50 per ton, which furnishes a basis for a capitalization of more than $1,000,000,000 based upon the ore alone.

The great Steel Trust was organized in 1901, with a capitalization, in round numbers, of $1,500,000,000, and people naturally asked: Can a trust earn enough to support this immense and highly watered issue of bonds and stocks? The report for the year ending December 30, 1909, shows that in 8 years and 9 months from its organization, on April 1, 1901, to the end of the year 1909, its net earnings, after deducting expenses, taxes, bond interest, sinking fund requirements, all ordinary charges for maintenance and depreciation of plants, and some extraordinary charges for extension of the plants, were, in round numbers, $616,500,000, or about $68,500,000 per year. It is proposed to put farm products on the free list and leave the products of this trust on the protected list. I for one will not give my consent. These industrial trusts are everywhere. Undoubtedly they have come to stay, but they are not entitled to protection in preference to the American farmer.

Mr. John Moody in his book, The Truth About the Trusts, quotes the following definition, given by Mr. S. C. T. Dodd, solicitor of the Standard Oil Co., of the modern trust, and gives it his approval. Mr. Dodd says:

> The term "trust" has now obtained a wider signification, and embraces every act, agreement, or combination of persons or capital made or formed with the intent, power, or tendency to monopolize business, to restrain or interfere with competitive trade, or to fix, influence, or increase the price of commodities.

Mr. Moody goes on to say:

> The writer is fully aware of the importance of monopoly as a factor for success in modern business life, and he recognizes its correlation with our current ethical standards. In a personal discussion of modern business and financial methods with the manager of one of our larger trusts he was told that the goal of success in business life to-day, speaking particularly of the larger corporate field, was to be reached through the successful pursuit for advantage and differentials, both natural and artificial. Said he—the manager referred to—"This talk of the elimination of competition is all nonsense. Competition is keener than ever to-day, but it is, of course, carried on on a larger plane. Where formerly the smaller producer competed to reduce his costs and undersell his competitors by the ordinary means of great economy and superior efficiency, he has now gone beyond that point. * * * The advantages he now seeks are not so crude. They consist in going to the root of things; in acquiring and dominating the sources of supply and of raw material; in controlling shipping rights of way; in securing exclusive benefits, rebates on large shipments, beneficial legislation, etc. Open competition long ago reached that point where it became necessary to resort to these more far-reaching methods."

After reviewing all the great trusts and combinations of the United States, and giving their capitalization, this author says:

> Thus it will be seen that, including industrial, franchise, transportation, and miscellaneous, about 445 active trusts are represented in this book, with a capitalization of $20,379,162,551. They embrace in all 8,644 original companies.

These are the great companies which "go to the root of things," acquire and dominate "the sources of supply and of raw material," secure "exclusive benefits," "beneficial legislation, etc."

While defending the organizations of trusts as useful on the whole, the author admits that they promote monopoly. He says (p. 495):

> We find this same tendency has been the creator of and is the underlying cause of monopoly * * * for man, in seeking to accomplish his purposes quickly, simply, and cheaply, has ever been alert to the possibilities of economy in method through the seeking of "short cuts." It is his desire to achieve at all hazards and in all ways; it was this inherent tendency which was the creator of competition. * * * And up to a certain point competition was the life of trade. But not so beyond that point. For quite early in the modern commercial and industrial life of man it was discovered that there were advantages to be gained in the adopting of methods somewhat different from those in vogue under the old régime of competition.
> By combining together and acquiring, either as a result of this joint effort or otherwise, a special privilege or monopoly, men found they could accomplish the same ends far more cheaply and satisfactorily than in the old ways. * * * It was then that men began to first cultivate this element of monopoly, and it was not long before the more progressive all recognized the importance of the monopoly feature and hastened to take advantage of it. * * *
> And this condition has been largely brought about by the existence of monopoly power. * * * This monopoly element is not merely the product of a tariff or of other so-called class legislation. It is far more fundamental than that. * * * The fact is we find the element of monopoly all about us, and how much civilization is going to get away from it * * *, is, in the light of the foregoing facts, an exceedingly intricate question.

Mr. President, the effect of the passage of this bill will not be fully understood by the country until they know that its chief, if not its only beneficiaries, are the trusts, who can import free raw material under its provisions, and who will continue to enjoy the benefit of a protective tariff upon the articles they manufacture. I propose here to name the trusts, or some of them, that will be thus benefited.

Free flaxseed from Canada will be a benefit to the American Linseed Oil Co., known as the Linseed Oil Trust, which was created by the merger of 47 different corporations. It is allied with the Smelters Trust and is under Standard Oil domination. Rockefeller, jr., is one of its directors. It controls 85 per cent of the linseed-oil production in the United States. It manufactures American and Calcutta linseed oil, raw and boiled, and refined varnish, oil cake, oil meal, and crushed flaxseed. It is a New Jersey corporation, with its main office in New York. Its common stock is $16,750,000 and its preferred stock is $16,750,000.

The American farmer is asked to surrender his protection under a duty upon flaxseed, so that this trust may get free raw material.

And so it goes.

The admission of barley and rye from Canada free of duty will help the following brewing and distillery trusts, among others:

The American Malt Corporation, a big holding company of New Jersey: Common stock, $5,248,300; preferred stock, $8,353,400; bonds, $3,714,000, bearing 6 per cent interest.

The Distilleries Securities Corporation (over 100 plants and warehouses in the United States), a New Jersey corporation: Common stock, $30,762,950, paying 6 per cent dividends; bonds, $15,400,412, bearing 5 and 6 per cent. It controls also the United States Industrial Alcohol Co., whose common stock is $12,000,000; preferred stock, $6,000,000; paying 7 per cent.

The Chicago Breweries (Ltd.), London and Chicago: Common stock, £400,000 sterling, paying 5½ per cent dividends, with bonds in £276,500 sterling, paying 6 per cent.

Dayton Breweries Co. (consolidation of 7 companies): Common stock, $1,249,125; preferred stock, same amount; bonds, $2,500,000; 6 per cent interest.

Independent Brewing Cos. (16 companies), of Pittsburg: Common stock, $3,918,923; preferred stock, the same amount, paying 7 per cent; bonds, $3,900,000, at 6 per cent interest.

Huebner-Toledo United Breweries Co., of Toledo, Ohio: Common stock, $1,278,000; preferred stock, the same amount, pays 6 per cent; bonds, $2,556,000, pays 6 per cent interest.

Jones Brewing Co. (Boston and London): Common stock, $5,324,000.

Kansas City Breweries Co.: Common stock, $1,557,000; preferred stock, $1,446,000, paying 6 per cent dividends; bonds, $3,114,111, paying 6 per cent interest.

Massachusetts Breweries Co. (10 combined Boston companies): Common stock, $6,532,000, paying 3 per cent dividends.

Milwaukee & Chicago Breweries (Ltd.) (English and American trust): Common stock, $3,774,250; preferred stock, exactly same amount, paying 8 per cent dividends; bonds, $3,500,000, paying 5 per cent interest.

People's Brewing Co., of Trenton, N. J.: Common stock, $1,100,000; preferred stock, $1,100,000; bonds, $1,000,000, bearing 6 per cent interest.

Pittsburg Brewing Co. (16 companies consolidated): Common stock, $5,962,250, paying 5 per cent dividends; preferred stock, $6,100,000, paying 7 per cent dividends; bonds, $6,319,000, paying 6 per cent interest.

St. Louis Breweries (Ltd.) (10 companies consolidated): Common stock, $4,383,000; preferred stock, exactly same amount, paying 8 per cent dividends; bonds, $4,880,600, paying 6 per cent interest.

Springfield Breweries Co., Springfield, Mass.: Common stock, $1,150,000; preferred stock, $1,150,000, paying 8 per cent dividends; bonds, $930,000, paying 6 per cent interest.

United Breweries Co. (13 Chicago companies consolidated): Common stock, $2,731,500; preferred stock, $2,731,500; bonds, $1,654,000, paying 6 per cent interest.

Hoster-Columbus Associated Breweries Co., Columbus, Ohio: Common stock, $1,650,000; preferred stock, $2,700,000; bonds, $5,250,000.

Mr. President, here are over 200 brewing and distilling companies combined into 17 trusts, with enormous issues of watered stocks, and a total capitalization of $188,500,000, which will be benefited by admitting barley and rye from Canada free of duty. The consumer of whisky and beer will pay the same price and the American farmer will suffer from the competition of his Canadian neighbor; the Brewing Trust and the Whisky Trust will add enormously to their net incomes by reason of this change, should it be made. But the profits will not be confined to the Brewing Trust and to the American Linseed Oil Co.

There is the American Hominy Co. (a trust of 8 companies), organized in New Jersey, with main office at Indianapolis: Common stock, $2,347,500; preferred stock, $1,163,500, paying 6 per cent; bonds, $695,000, paying 5 per cent interest.

The Bordens Condensed Milk Co. (a trust of United States and foreign companies), organized in New Jersey, with main office in New York City: Common stock, $17,500,000, paying 10 per cent dividends; preferred stock, $17,500,000, paying 6 per cent.

The National Biscuit Co. (a consolidation of 80 plants in the United States), a new Jersey trust, with main office in New York: Common stock, $29,236,000, paying 5 per cent dividends; preferred stock, $24,804,500, paying 7 per cent; bonds, $970,000, paying 5 and 6 per cent.

Of course, this proposed law would help this great trust. Free Canadian wheat, with a tariff remaining on flour and biscuits, would "make money" for it.

On March 31, 1911, the following appeared in the Chicago Record-Herald, which shows who is helped by the prospect of this Canadian trade deal being ratified by Congress:

BISCUIT SHARES SELL AT NEW HIGH RECORD—COMMON STOCK REACHES 135 IN BOTH THE CHICAGO AND NEW YORK MARKETS.

National Biscuit common jumped to a new record price, 135, yesterday in the Chicago market and in New York. At that price it was 5 points above the preferred stock. The steady advance recently has led to the expectation of some favorable announcement on the stock other than the reports of larger earnings and the recent increase in the dividend rate to 7 per cent. With the preferred and common drawing the same dividend as they now do, the common would hardly run ahead of the preferred in the market if no further developments were expected.

But where does the consumer get any benefit? The tariff remains on biscuit, oatmeal, and all prepared foods. The trust, and the trust alone, gets the benefit of the removal of the tariff from oats, wheat, barley, and other cereals.

In addition to the National Biscuit Co., there are still other big cereal trusts.

Here, for instance, is the Quaker Oats Co. (another New Jersey trust); common stock, $4,487,200; preferred stock, $8,532,900, paying 6 per cent.

The North American Biscuit Co.; common stock, $4,438,300; preferred stock, $3,000,000.

The Pacific Coast Biscuit Co., with main office at Portland, Oreg.; common stock, $1,235,000; bonds, $825,000, paying 6 per cent interest. Also the Great Western Cereal Co. (another New Jersey trust); common stock, $2,500,000; preferred stock, $500,000, paying 8 per cent; bonds, $1,017,000, paying 6 per cent interest.

These trusts will profit enormously by free trade with Canada in wheat, oats, and barley, with a protective tariff on flour, biscuit, oatmeal, cracked wheat, hulled barley, Grape Nuts, Force, Shredded Wheat Biscuits, and the like. The poor man will pay no less for these, but the profits of the trust will be greater. Can anyone dispute this?

The Agricultural Implement Trust will be able to get into Canada without the payment of a tariff, and the Canadian farmer may thus get his farm machinery cheaper and be thereby still better equipped to compete with the American farmer under free trade in farm products. Besides these, the following trusts will profit by that arrangement:

The American Seeding Machine Co. (a New Jersey trust): Common stock, $2,000,000; preferred stock, $1,161,000; paying 7 per cent.

The International Harvester Co. (a New Jersey trust): Common stock, $60,000,000; preferred stock, $60,000,000.

With cattle coming in free and the tariff remaining on all packing-house products, the great American packers will profit by the new law, but the consumer of meat will receive no benefit whatever.

Mr. Moody, the author of the book, The Truth About the Trusts, says:

The so-called Meat Trust, or Beef Trust, while nonexistent, as far as a distinct corporation is concerned, yet is in a sense an actual fact.

When this bill becomes a law, the Beef Trust, upon the basis of their shipments into Canada last year, will save in duties $239,213, and the Agricultural Implement Trust will save in reduction in tariff rates $218,488. The Canadian farmer may get some of the benefit of this saving, but the American farmer will get nothing. On the contrary, the advantage, if any, will go to his Canadian competitor.

I wonder if the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will notice this. I think he interrupted me yesterday as to the tariff on flour and on wheat.

The removal of the tariff of 25 cents per bushel on wheat and the placing of a protective duty of 50 cents a barrel on flour actually increases the protection now enjoyed by the Millers' Trust. This can easily be demonstrated, and was demonstrated very clearly in the House debates. For instance, it takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. With the present duty on wheat the manufacturer of flour should have a compensatory duty of $1.12 per barrel on flour, because the tariff on 4½ bushels of wheat at 25 cents per bushel is $1.12. Under the Payne tariff the duty on flour is 25 per cent ad valorem, and during 1910 the flour imported from Canada was valued on an average at $5 per barrel. The duty at 25 per cent ad valorem amounted to $1.25 per barrel, but $1.12 of that amount was to compensate for the tariff of 25 cents per bushel on the 4½ bushels of wheat it contained. This left a protective duty on flour of only 13 cents per barrel under the Payne law.

Under this law wheat will come in free and the compensatory duty of $1.12 per barrel will be eliminated; but a clear protective duty of 50 cents per barrel will be imposed, as against 13 cents per barrel under the Payne law, an actual increase in the duty on flour of 37 cents per barrel. Wheat will come in free, bread will be no cheaper, and the Millers' Trust alone will profit. To show how this Millers' Trust is robbing the American farmer and dairyman by extortionate charges for bran and middlings, I will incorporate in my remarks a table showing comparative prices of mill feeds in Canada and the United States for 1910, as reported by the Northwestern Miller.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator addressed himself to me personally a few moments ago.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will recall, on yesterday I told him I was going to elaborate on this point. That is the only reason I did so.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator claim that the tariff of $1.12 on the wheat going into a barrel of flour under the present Payne-Aldrich bill affects the price of wheat in this country?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The figures overwhelmingly show a difference in the price, when comparisons are made between points in the United States and points on the Canadian side, of from 15 to 25 cents per bushel, about half the amount of the tariff, on an average.

Mr. REED. I should like to get a direct answer, whether it does affect the price of wheat on this side of the line.

Mr. CRAWFORD. My contention is that it does in large centers, like that dominated by Minneapolis with its milling industry.

Mr. REED. Will it do it generally?

Mr. CRAWFORD. To a certain extent it will everywhere.

Mr. REED. Now, if it affects the price of wheat, does it make it higher or lower on this side of the line?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Higher. We admit it, and we want to make it higher.

Mr. REED. Will a reduction from $1.12 on the wheat necessary to make a barrel of flour to 50 cents on the wheat necessary to make a barrel of flour result in a reduction of the price of wheat on this side of the line?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it follows that it will affect it——

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Depress it, for the benefit of the miller.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator claim that there is a hard and fast Milling Trust in this country that absolutely controls the price of flour?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have not gone to the extent of making so sweeping a statement.

Mr. REED. No. As a matter of fact, there are thousands of absolutely independent mills, are there not?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Undoubtedly—small mills, in the country.

Mr. REED. If those mills get their wheat cheaper and are not in a trust or combination, will they not be able to sell flour cheaper.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Those mills would not import many bushels of wheat.

Mr. REED. Do they not buy on the market of the wheat that is imported?

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the larger sense possibly it might affect it, but so far as concerns the small amount consumed by them I think the difference would not be appreciable. But the point to which I am directing attention is that in this bill, which I understand the Senator and others are supporting, you are leaving the tariff on the flour and taking it off of the wheat. You are not reducing the price of the loaf of bread one penny.

Mr. REED. If the placing of a dollar and twelve cents tariff on the wheat necessary to make a barrel of flour does raise the price, then will not the reduction to 50 cents have a tendency to lower the price?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It would.

Mr. REED. If you lower the price of flour, does the Senator contend, in view of his concession that not all of the mills are in the Milling Trust, if there be one, that that will not reduce the price of flour in the sack that is purchased by the heads of families and manufactured into bread in the households of the land?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The amount in that case would be infinitesimal.

Mr. REED. If the benefit will be infinitesimal to the consumer, will not the injury be infinitesimal to the farmer?

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the trouble is that the Senator is supporting a bill here which is singling out the farmer and applying to him the principle of free trade—absolute free trade—and the injustice of it, to which I am calling attention, is in the fact that he is expected to buy in a protected market and yield the advantage which the present tariff gives him.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator claim that in buying in a protected market the purchaser has to pay a greater price?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Undoubtedly, in many cases where competition is destroyed.

Mr. REED. Then, what becomes of the argument on which the Senator's party has stood for 30 years, that the foreigner pays the tax?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That argument is very sound where you can mantain healthy competition at home, but in the face of a large array of trusts such as these it is very greatly weakened.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator to say that the trusts so stand astride this land now that there is in fact no real competition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In many lines that is true.

Mr. REED. And that has all grown up under the protective policy and under the protecting control of your party.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am perfectly satisfied with the declaration of our platform to discriminate to the extent of the difference in cost and to pay that difference in cost in the interests of American industry, and the American people are willing to pay it. But we want it to be distributed fairly.

Mr. REED. I want to say this, in conclusion——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the Senator will conclude, because I want to proceed.

Mr. REED. I wish to make one matter clear and then will not disturb the Senator longer. I would not have interrupted him, but he referred to me personally. The Senator refers to this as my bill, or a bill that I am supporting.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Its chief support comes from that side of the Chamber.

Mr. REED. I want to file a disclaimer. It is neither my bill nor a Democratic bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am very glad to hear that. I thought it was a Democratic bill. Its chief support comes from the Democratic Party just now.

Mr. REED. It appears to be a bill drawn or dictated by a very distinguished gentleman whom your party nominated and elected to the Presidency.

Mr. CRAWFORD. A most excellent President, but in this one instance the company he keeps is very amazing to me.

The American farmer was unjustly discriminated against in the Payne tariff law when it removed the duty from hides and left a protective rate upon boots and shoes and leather products, a proceeding which subsequent trade shows did not reduce prices a penny to the consumer, but helped the Leather Trust. Shall we now make a similar present to the Miller Trust?

The American Hide & Leather Co. is a consolidation of 21 large companies and controls 75 per cent of the trade in upper leather. It also is one of these New Jersey concerns, with common stock, $11,274,100; preferred stock, $12,548,300, paying 7 per cent; bonds, $7,194,000 paying 6 per cent interest.

Its companion in monopoly is the Central Leather Co., a New Jersey concern, which is a consolidation of 70 per cent of the tanneries of the United States: Common stock, $38,409,800; preferred stock, $31,061,000, paying 7 per cent; and bonds, $39,062,000, paying 5 per cent interest.

Under the Payne law these trusts secured the benefit of free hides at the expense of the American farmer. I have shown elsewhere how he is compelled to pay many million dollars a year for fertilizers to restore his land and maintain cultivation. He pays his money to the Fertilizer Trust, such as the American Agricultural Chemical Co., a consolidation of 25 fertilizer plants, with common stock, $17,114,100; preferred stock, $18,382,000, paying 6 per cent; bonds, $2,500,000, paying 4½ per cent interest.

Mr. President these great trusts employ many men, and in recent years the cry has been made by their employees that the cost of living is oppressive. Instead of raising the wages of their employees they attempt to satisfy the demand by securing the passage of this law, which will deceive the masses temporarily but will not bring relief from high prices. At the same time, under the pretense that this law will reduce the cost of living, they are securing a still greater monopoly than that they have heretofore enjoyed, and, as usual, the American farmer will have to foot the bill.

The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] disclaims it, but I am glad that the Democratic Party is willing to bear the responsibility for the passage of this law. Republicans should be willing to let them have the credit for it. Under this proposed law, at every turn, after a product leaves the farm, it comes under the influence of the trust. The Corn Products Refining Co., capitalized at $87,000,000; the American Woolen Co., with a capitalization of $94,000,000; the American Tin Can Trust, in which 123 different plants have been merged, with a capitalization of $82,000,000; the Lumber Trust and timber barons, with their control of the standing timber—all these are organized to control and can largely determine prices and limit output. The farmer alone runs a single-handed business, his farm and farm stock and implements being his capital, his hired man and the members of his own family supplying his labor. This bill proposes to protect the others and require him to compete with the world, because free trade with Canada in farm products amounts to that.

The Canadians refused to throw down the bars and take an equal chance with the people of the United States by a mutual remission of tariff duties on all manufactured articles, because they know that they can not compete on equal terms with the American manufacturer. But they are eager to do this with the products of the farm, because they know that with cheaper land and greater productivity of soil they can successfully compete with our farmers in the raising of cereals and many other farm products.

The speech which Sir Wilfrid Laurier made in the Canadian Parliament on the 7th day of March last shows how they look at it. He said:

> We are exporters, not of manufactured products, but of natural products, and we are large importers of manufactured products; and we have given the Americans a free entrance into our markets for their natural products, as they have given us a free entrance into their markets for our natural products. It is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products; but our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting the agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements.

We have allowed Canada to tickle the adherents of Gov. Foss, of Massachusetts, and the selfish and highly protected manufacturers of New England, through this treaty, into a cold-blooded betrayal of the American farmer.

In 1904 Mr. Foss delivered an address which was put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the other day as representing the sentiment of the people of Massachusetts, in which he advocated the removal of the tariff from the following, when imported from Canada: Horses, sheep, breadstuffs, eggs, hay, fish, fruits, hides, dairy products, vegetables, wood pulp, and unmanufactured wood. In this speech Mr. Foss said:

> It is now fully recognized among those whose opinion is worth anything that we must either make wheat free or prepare to suffer disaster in our milling interests. As to barley, the outrageous duty upon that, and upon the malt made from it, is the heaviest burden our great brewing industries are called upon to bear.

Mr. President, it was not so much the securing of cheaper bread that Mr. Foss wanted, because he was not proposing to remove the duty from flour; it was the Massachusetts Millers' Trust he was concerned about. It was not because he wanted to secure beer at a smaller price per glass to the consumer that he wanted the "outrageous tariff" removed from barley and barley malt; it was the precious Brewing Trust of Massachusetts he was anxious to serve by sacrificing the American farmer. This is the kind of patriotism now manifesting itself in Massachusetts under the Democratic leadership of Gov. Foss. To save her millers and her brewers they are willing to proclaim free trade in the two staple cereals raised on the farms of the United States, even though doing so will not reduce the cost of living a single mill—just as two years ago they succeeded in putting hides on the free list without reducing a particle the price of the manufactures of leather, which was left on the protected list.

To show more in detail how this bill discriminates in favor of the trusts and against the farmer of the United States, I ask leave to print as a part of my remarks the following table, prepared by Hon. A. E. Chamberlain, superintendent of farmers' institutes, held under the supervision of the South Dakota College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This table is made from the schedules submitted with the President's message accompanying the trade agreement. The table is confined to articles in which the American farmer is most directly interested. As shown by Mr. Chamberlain, the present duty on plows, harrows, disks, harvesters, seed drills, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, and thrashing machines coming into the United States from Canada is 15 per cent ad valorem; going from the United States into Canada, 20 per cent ad valorem. Under the proposed law, the duty will be 15 per cent ad valorem each way, which is a reduction of from 2½ to 5 per cent ad valorem on the present Canadian rate. Last year we imported $74,618 worth of agricultural implements from Canada and our manufacturers shipped $2,579,597 worth into Canada. The proposed law would have made no reduction on the implements coming this way, but would have saved to our manufacturers $123,052.38 on the duty paid on the implements they shipped to Canada. This would have helped the great International Harvester Trust and the Canadian farmer, but not the American farmer.

The present duty on portable and traction engines and horsepowers for farm use is 30 per cent ad valorem on the articles coming from Canada into the United States, and 20 per cent on the articles going from the United States into Canada. Under the proposed law it would be 20 per cent ad valorem each way. We did not import any of these articles from Canada last year, but we exported $1,803,792 worth to Canada. Had the reduced rate been in force our manufacturers would have saved $18,037.92, and some gain might have accrued to the Canadian consumer, but none to the American farmer.

On hay loaders, potato diggers, hay tedders, feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, and field and road rollers the present duty on the articles coming from Canada into the United States is 45 per cent ad valorem; on the same articles going from the United States into Canada 25 per cent ad valorem. We do not import any of these articles from Canada, and the 5 per cent reduction on the Canadian duty will inure solely to the benefit of our American manufacturers. There is nothing in that for a consumer on this side of the line.

On clocks, watches, and parts thereof, the present duty on the articles coming from Canada into the United States is 40 per cent ad valorem (average); on the articles going from the United States into Canada, 30 per cent. Under the proposed law the duty would be 27½ per cent ad valorem either way. Last year we exported $294,442 worth of these articles to Canada and imported from Canada only $1,090 worth. This change can not be expected to enlarge the trade either way or be of any consequence, even to Connecticut.

With a higher duty on horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs than Canada imposed, we imported from there $1,128,100 worth during the last fiscal year, and only exported $560,285 in animals to them, a difference of $567,815. Placing them on the free list both ways will, no doubt, increase the number we shall export considerably.

Of wheat, we imported 152,383 bushels that paid a duty of 25 cents per bushel, and we exported to Canada only 54,964 bushels; the duty imposed by them was only 12 cents per bushel. With the duty on wheat removed by both countries, the American flour mills will undoubtedly import from Canada millions of bushels each year for milling purposes, and thus Canadian wheat will come into direct competition with wheat raised by the American farmer in every milling center in the United States. The miller's price is not controlled by Liverpool. Local competition is very potential.

We imported 946,479 bushels of oats from Canada last year upon which there was paid to the United States a duty of 15 cents per bushel. We exported to Canada 23,361 bushels, upon which there was paid to the Canadians a duty of 10 cents per bushel. With oats on the free list each way, and with prepared cereals, such as Quaker Oats, oatmeal, and hulled oats, on the protected list, the importation of oats from Canada will, no doubt, increase very materially.

Our corn, under present law, is admitted into Canada free; so the proposed law will not enlarge the market for our surplus corn crop. Corn and cotton are the only staple crops in which Canada can not compete with us, and they are now on the free list in Canada.

Of flaxseed, with a duty of 25 cents per bushel, last year we imported from Canada 1,410,398 bushels, and with a Canadian duty of only 10 cents per bushel, we exported to Canada less than 2,000 bushels. We do not fully supply the home demand. If the tariff is removed entirely the American Linseed Oil Trust will use the Canadian flaxseed supply to beat down the price charged by the American farmer. This is plain enough. Under the present duty of 6 cents a pound we import more cheese and butter than we export. If Canadian cheese and butter are put on the free list the American farmer will certainly feel the effect of the competition.

Mr. Chamberlain calls attention to the fact that the moment the manufacturer touches one of these "natural products" it is protected in the proposed law. The free list is so formed as to practically prevent an article, coming in duty free, from reaching the ultimate consumer. It goes first and always to the manufacturer. The packer, under this proposed law, may send his agent to Canada and buy a trainload of cattle, sheep, or hogs; the whole lot, 1 trainload or 20 trainloads, can come in free; "but if a citizen of Detroit should buy a mutton chop, a pail of lard, a ham, or a pig's ear in Windsor, Canada, and bring it home for use at his family table in Detroit, he would have to pay the United States custom officer 1¼ cents per pound duty."

Under the present duty on meat products we exported into Canada from the United States, during the last fiscal year, $3,587,044 worth of meats, lard, and tallow, on which the American packers paid a duty of $626,355.14. Under the proposed law they would have paid on the same products only $378,040.85, and would thereby have saved $230,314.29. The saving would have gone to the packer. The consumer would have received none of it.

We imported from Canada during the same period $84,704 worth of meat, on which a duty of $16,941 was collected by the United States. Under the proposed law this would be reduced only $4,236. In other words, the American packer now dominates the Canadian market after paying, in advance, 2 cents per pound duty on his product. What will he be able to do if this duty is reduced 37½ per cent, as proposed by this bill? And how will the American consumer be benefited? The Canadian can not compete with the American packer in his own market, which he has attempted to protect against him; how then can we hope that he will be able to pay 1¼ cents per pound duty to the United States and compete against the Packing House Trust in the United States?

With a duty of from $2 on a veal calf up to $22 on an $80 steer, we imported from Canada 4,156 head of cattle more than we exported to Canada last year. With a duty of $1.50 per head on hogs, we imported from Canada about $4,000 worth more than we exported to her. With a duty of 75 cents on a lamb and $1.50 on a sheep, we imported from Canada 67,675 head more than we exported to her. The packer kills them and ships them back to Canada, paying the Canadian Government 2 cents per pound duty, or $626,355, and thus does a business in that country of about $4,000,000 a year—and does that at a profit. If we reduce the duty he is required to pay Canada, $239,314, and allow him also to import these animals from Canada free of duty, he will make much more on his Canadian business than he does now; but he will not reduce the price; neither here nor there. This is a good proposal for the American packer and the Canadian stock farmer. It is a bad one for the Canadian packer and American farmer, and it gives no relief whatever to the American consumer.

Mr. Chamberlain also confirms the statement I have made that it takes approximately 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, and that there are 74 pounds of bran and middlings left.

We imported from Canada during the last year 143,830 barrels of flour and $105,265 of bran and middlings more than we exported to Canada. This was approximately equal to 505,944 bushels of wheat. We also imported 97,419 bushels of wheat from there in excess of our importation to Canada. When wheat is worth $1 per bushel, flour usually sells at $5 per barrel, and bran and shorts at a little more than $20 per ton. When the American miller, under the present duty, goes to Canada and buys 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour and 74 pounds of bran and shorts, he pays $1.12½ duty on the wheat. If the Canadian miller takes another 4½ bushels of wheat and makes from it one barrel of flour and 74 pounds of bran and shorts and brings it to the United States to sell, he must pay $1.25 duty on the flour and 15 cents on the bran and middlings, or a total of $1.40. But under the present law the American miller is protected against the Canadian miller to the amount of 27½ cents per barrel of flour and the by-products, if both barrels are made of Canadian wheat. Under the proposed treaty he would be protected to the amount of 50 cents on the flour and 9 cents on the bran and shorts, or 59 cents in all, an increase of over 100 per cent. This will add to the profits of the Millers' Trust, but will not reduce the cost of a loaf of bread to the consumer.

Rough lumber, right from the saw, is placed on the free list by the pending bill, but the farmer does not use rough lumber. To avail himself of this provision he would have to unload his car in transit at a planing mill, have the lumber finished, and then reload and reship it. The expense involved would be far more than what he saves by the remission of the tariff. The manufacturer bringing from Canada large quantities of rough lumber to his own mill in the United States is the only person who could profit by the placing of rough lumber on the free list. The reduction of the tariff on lath, shingles, and finished lumber is well, as far as it goes, but is not likely to result in a reduction in price by the retailer of lumber. The proposed bill reduces the Canadian duty on coal coming into Canada from the United States, and if our exports of coal to that country continue as large as they were last year our coal barons will save $455,246.08 per annum by the reduction; but there is nothing in this to compensate the American farmer for the removal of all duties on farm products, nor to reduce the price he pays for coal.

The American Implement Trust now sells to the Canadian farmer every implement which he uses. The Canadian manufacturer can not hold the Canadian market against the American manufacturer of farm tools and machinery under the rates as they now exist, to say nothing of undertaking to compete with him in the United States.

It will be noted, however, that in the proposed bill no reduction of duty is proposed on these farm implements, necessary on every farm, when imported into this country, but there is a material reduction of the duty on almost every article of that character entering Canada. This tends to help the Canadian farmer, but does not help the American farmer. It is difficult to conceive how a bill more discriminatory and unjust to a great producing class could be devised. The Republican Party has declared in favor of a protective tariff that would measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and secure to American industry a reasonable profit. To ascertain this cost in production it has favored, and does favor, the creation of a nonpartisan tariff board. We have such a board now, and it has spent many months in patient and faithful and efficient investigation. Strange to say, its investigations as to the cost of production of pulp wood, wood pulp, news-print paper, and as to the difference in value of farm lands, farm labor, and amount of crop yield per acre in Canada and in the United States have been completely ignored in these negotiations with Canada and in this proposed legislation.

The Report of the Tariff Board, page 32, shows that in Canada the average cost per ton of wood pulp and news-print paper is $28.39; in the United States, $32.53, a difference against us of $4.14 per ton. The present tariff is not sufficient to cover this difference, being only about $3.12½ per ton. But the purpose of the present bill is, so far as it can be done by act of the Canadian Parliament and a contemporaneous act of the Congress of the United States, to ignore this difference in cost of production entirely and to put news-print paper and wood pulp on the free list.

Why? Simply because the great newspapers and the great magazines of the United States, as a special class—aggressively organized for the purpose—demand it, and propose to get it as a special privilege.

The American farmer is not organized. He does not control these great instrumentalities for molding public opinion, so his right to a square deal is set aside instantly when a powerful organization like that of the American Newspaper Union or of the New England manufacturers, who, under the leadership of the Democratic governor of Massachusetts, want free raw material, decide that agriculture is no longer one of the great industries in the United States entitled to consideration by the Government. Mr. President, why, if the imposition of tariff duties is restricted to the sole purpose of raising revenues, should the importers of wood pulp and news-print paper, as a class, be exempt from taxation? I hold no brief for the paper manufacturers; we have no paper mills in the State I, in part, represent, and I am simply trying to look at this matter from the standpoint of simple justice; but I confess that I can not see anything fair in a proposal which bestows a special privilege upon one great class well able to bear its fair share of the burden of taxation.

If the tariff is restricted to the sole purpose of raising revenue, there will, nevertheless, be a substantial discrimination in favor of our home market in the very fact that import duties to the extent of $300,000,000 are levied each year. That discrimination will help somebody in the United States. Is it not fair and reasonable that the American farmer, as well as the manufacturers in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, should have some of the benefits by having a part of this revenue duty laid upon those products of the farm sent into this great market by his Canadian competitor? To refuse even this much is a discrimination against him for which no reasonable excuse can be given.

If, on the other hand, we must submit, and every product of the farm produced by his Canadian competitor must come into the United States free of duty, why not enlarge the list, so that Canada may send her manufactured products into this market free of duty also? It seems clear that we can do this, if we make it a part of the reciprocal act, without involving the favored-nation clause in treaties with other countries. An amendment of that kind certainly would not annul the agreement. The bill pending before the Canadian Parliament to carry out the proposed reciprocal agreement is printed on page 195 of the hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means. It contains the following clause:

* * * The act proposed * * * shall not come into operation until a date to be named by the governor in council in a proclamation to be published in the Canadian Gazette, and that such proclamation may be issued whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council that the United States has enacted, or will forthwith enact, such legislation as will grant to Canada the reciprocal advantages provided for in certain correspondence dated Washington, January 21, 1911, between the Hon. P. C. Knox, Secretary of State for the United States, and the Hon. W. S. Fielding, minister of finance for Canada, and the Hon. William Patterson, minister of commerce for Canada.

Mr. President, the intention of this language is plain. This Canadian bill simply requires that it shall not become operative until the United States has enacted a law granting to Canada the reciprocal advantages provided for in the agreement. When the United States has done that, the Canadian act will go into effect. It will not prevent its taking effect if the act of the United States not only grants to Canada the reciprocal advantages named in the agreement, but does more, and, without asking anything further from her, gives to Canada other concessions, which will not only benefit her, but which will be of benefit to the consumers of the United States.

If it is a good thing for us to favor the Canadian farmer for the purpose of "cementing our friendly relations" with the Dominion, it is a still better thing to favor the Canadian manufacturer for a like reason; and by favoring him we may be able to restore to some extent the competition which our great trusts have destroyed in the United States; in other words, actually reduce the cost of living to the masses.

The Canadian Yearbooks for 1908 and 1909 show marked progress in the manufacture of food products in Canada from 1871 to 1906.

In 1871 there were 3,922 establishments for the manufacture of food products in the Dominion, with a capital employed of $12,532,202, in which 10,728 persons were employed; $2,413,701 paid annually as wages for labor, $45,911,827 for raw materials, and the value of the output that year was $56,689,227.

In 1906 there were 5,012 establishments in the Dominion engaged in manufacturing food products, as follows: Twenty-nine, baking powder and flavoring extracts; 456, bread and biscuits; 2,958, butter and cheese; 4, chewing gum; 4, cocoa and chocolate; 33, coffee and spices; 5, condensed milk; 3, confectioners' supplies; 41, evaporated fruits and vegetables; 465, preserved fish; 832, flouring and grist mill products; 59, fruit and vegetable canning; 61, slaughtering and meat packing; 7, slaughtering, not including packing; 8 sugar refineries; 3 tallow refineries; 34 vinegar and pickle factories; 10 other food-product establishments. The capital employed was $89,880,145; the amount paid out that year in these plants for wages was $12,025,927. The number of wage earners employed was 45,520. The value of the output was $173,359,431.

This is one line of manufacturing only—food products. If the products of the Canadian farms must be admitted free to promote good will with our Canadian neighbors and to check the tendency in the cost of living to increase, why should we not admit these manufactured food products from the Canadian factories into the United States free of duty for the same reason? Who, except the American trust and the American manufacturer—who seems to think the country exists for his sole benefit—can be opposed to it? Why give free trade to the Canadian farmer and refuse to remit duties to the Canadian manufacturer?

The United States Crop Reporter for January, 1911, shows clearly that the American farmer is capable for years to come, if given a square deal with other classes, of increasing the production of farm lands to meet all the demands of an ever-increasing population. I read from page 5:

> The foregoing presentation of the information that is possessed concerning the trend of agricultural production in this country, in comparison with population, makes it plain that in spite of the fact that the United States is now passing through some of the early and middle phases of agricultural land exploitation, it nevertheless appears that the final stage of better agriculture and increased production per acre has been reached in many States for a varying number of crops, and that production per acre is not only beginning to exceed normal increase of population, but really to exceed the actual increase. The ability of the soil and of the agricultural arts and sciences to produce crops at a rate greater than either the normal rate of increase of population or the normal as temporarily influenced by immigration has been demonstrated times innumerable by the Department of Agriculture, by the experiment stations, and by intelligent farmers all over the country. The potentiality of agricultural production as a national achievement sufficient for growth of population has been so numerously and so thoroughly demonstrated as to be now beyond intelligent question. * * *
> Quietly the farmer has been rising from the depths into which he was cast by the ruinously low prices in the early nineties until now he has reached a plane where he receives a well-deserved recompense for his labors. Probably never before has the average farmer been in better condition than in recent years. Farmers are rapidly acquiring the modern conveniences formerly possessed only by those living in the cities, such as furnace-heated houses, water and bath facilities, free mail delivery, telephones, etc., and, with good crops commanding remunerative prices, he is becoming more and more able to secure such conveniences and to indulge in many luxuries enjoyed previously only by the prosperous urban communities.
> Within the past 10 years the purchasing power of the farmer has increased more than 50 per cent. Such conditions are having, and will continue to have, more force in keeping the rising generation of farmers' children upon the farm than volumes upon volumes of printed advice to stay there. When there was hardship and no profit in farming, such advice was useless; now farm life is becoming profitable and more attractive, and such advice is becoming unnecessary.

Mr. President, that situation gives us the solution of the puzzling social problems growing out of the congestion in our great cities. It is a situation that should be safeguarded and encouraged. There is the pure fragrance of the clover field and new-mown hay about it. Why should it be disturbed by the nightmare of free trade in Canadian farm products? Why should we break down the work of the agricultural college in the United States by a retrograde policy?

The profits made by the farmer are not inordinate. Some ridiculously false statements are being circulated about them. The claim has been made recently that the Crop Reporter, from which I have been reading, shows that while the price of 85 articles purchased by the farmer during the period from 1899 to 1909 increased only 12.1 per cent, the money return per acre in the United States in crops of corn, oats, wheat, barley, rye, buckwheat, potatoes, hay, tobacco, and cotton increased 72.7 per cent. The figures quoted were tabulated by Victor H. Olmsted, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, from replies received by the bureau from a circular letter mailed by it to a large number of retail dealers. These replies were such as would be voluntarily made by mail, under such circumstances, and were not shown to be based upon book entries, nor given under oath. It is undoubtedly true that farm products advanced very materially in price between 1899 and 1909, but it is utterly ridiculous to make the assertion based upon letters written by retailers that the articles the farmer buys increased in price during the same period only 12.1 per cent.

The figures presented by Mr. HINDS the other day show how absurd the figures given by these retailers are. He compared the "consumer's price" and the "farmer's price" in New York for one year. The figures show that the consumers paid $8,212,000 for onions, for which the farmer received only $821,000; $60,000,000 for potatoes, for which the farmer received only $8,437,000; $9,125,000 for cabbages, for which he was paid only $1,825,000; $48,880,000 for milk, for which he received only $22,912,000; also, $28,730,000 for eggs, for which the farmer was paid only $17,238,000.

The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] in the remarkably able address he delivered on this subject recently left nothing to be said upon the claim that the farmer is receiving an excessive price for the products of his farm. Bulletin No. 75 of the Bureau of Labor shows that during the eight years from 1899 to 1908 there was an increase of three and four times 12.1 per cent in the price of cloths and clothing, fuel and lighting, metals and implements, lumber and building materials, as well as in the price of farm products, and that when we consider the unusually low prices of farm products for ten years prior to 1899, the increase in the price of this class of commodities since then is not at all disproportionate to that in other lines. The majority report of the select committee appointed by the Senate last year to investigate wages and the prices of commodities, although it was never able to carry on an exhaustive examination because the Democratic Members of this body defeated the consideration of an appropriation to pay the expenses of the investigation, found that during the period from 1900 to 1909 the natural products of the farm in crude form advanced in price 36.1 per cent, while the products of the forest advanced 40.3 per cent, and manufactured farm products advanced 24.2 per cent.

The Massachusetts commission to investigate the cost of living in 1910 (p. 64) gives the following percentages, showing increase in average prices paid for food products during the period from 1897 to 1910:

	Per cent.
Beef (roasting) increased	37.0
Pork (fresh) increased	79.0
Pork (salt) increased	92.0
Flour (wheat) increased	28.6
Bacon increased	71.4
Eggs increased	25.1
Butter increased	46.1
Milk increased	37.5
Potatoes decreased	33.4
Coal increased	30.2
Cotton goods:
Sheeting, 9–8, brown, increased	49.4
Sheeting, 9–8, bleached, increased	54.1
Cotton flannel increased	20.0
Ticking increased	70.0
Prints increased	38.5
Boots, men's heavy, increased	30.9

The investigation of the Massachusetts commission was strictly nonpartisan and very exhaustive.

In the face of such facts as these, as well as in the face of facts universally known to all, how absurd it is for a few retailers to attempt to convince the public that the articles which the farmer buys have only increased in price 12.1 per cent during the last 10 years. Mr. President, it seems to me that the attitude of the highly protected manufacturers of New England and the Middle and Eastern States in joining in this movement to put the American farmer on a free-trade basis is extremely narrow and selfish. They have, over and over again, demanded and received protection for their industries against all the other countries of the world, until they have become rich and powerful. During the last 10 years, by combination, they have crushed out competition in their own country, and now, having done that, they want special privileges further extended to them by taking away from the only independent individual in this country, the American farmer, protection on the material produced by him. Hides, wheat, barley, rye, flaxseed, rough lumber, dairy products, cattle, wool, vegetables, eggs, and poultry must be admitted from an alien country free of tax, to help these great trusts in the United States who have crushed out competition at home, who will pocket the increased profit, and the consumer will go on paying the same old prices. Of course, these patriots make their demands on the ground that they want to more firmly cement the friendly relations existing between the two nations. But you all know what old Dr. Johnson said about patriotism being the last refuge of the scoundrel.

Let me not be misunderstood here. I have no doubt about the sincerity and patriotism of the President. I accept with full credit his purpose to view the proposed enactment from a high plane, without attempting to determine the exact balance of financial gain; and that, as it appears to him, "no yardstick can measure the benefits of the two peoples of this freer commercial intercourse and no trade agreement should be judged wholly by customhouse statistics." But I refuse to credit the manufacturers, who have fattened to excess under the privilege of excessive tariff protection, with the same disinterestedness, when they—in order to escape paying their employees better wages, and in order to make still greater profits for themselves by securing free raw materials while retaining a protective rate on their manufactured products—join in the movement against the American farmer. Experience is the great teacher, Mr. President, and fortunately we have had some experience with Canadian reciprocity.

A proposal of almost identically the same character, even in detail, was enacted by both countries in 1854 and remained in force until 1865. The act approved August 5, 1854, was to become operative whenever the President received satisfactory evidence that the Parliament of Great Britain and the Provincial Canadian Parliaments had passed laws on their part giving full effect to the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. It admitted free of duty the following articles, being the growth and produce of the Canadian Provinces:

Grain; flour and breadstuffs of all kinds; animals of all kinds; fresh, smoked, and salted meats; cotton wool; seeds and vegetables; undried fruits; dried fruits; fish of all kinds; products of fish and all other creatures living in the water; poultry; eggs; hides; furs, skins, or tails, undressed; stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state; slate; butter; cheese; tallow; lard; hams; manures; ores of metals of all kinds; coal, pitch, and tar; turpentine; ashes; timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, and sawed, unmanufactured in whole or in part; firewood; plants, shrubs, and trees; pelts; wool; fish oil; rice; broom corn and bark; gypsum, ground or unground; hewn or wrought or unwrought burr or grindstones; dyestuffs; flax, hemp, and tow, unmanufactured; unmanufactured tobacco; rags.

Article 5 of the Elgin-Marcy treaty of 1854 provided that it should take effect as soon as the laws required to carry it into operation shall have become passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and by the Provincial Parliaments of those of the British North American colonies which are affected by this treaty, on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States, on the other. "Such assent having been given, the treaty shall remain in force for 10 years from the date at which it may come into operation, and, further, until the expiration of 12 months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of 10 years or at any time afterwards. It is clearly understood, however, that this stipulation is not intended to affect the reservation made by article 4 of the present treaty with regard to the right of temporarily suspending the operation of articles 3 and 4 thereof."

In 1860 the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Cobb, submitted to Congress the reports of two agents of the United States Government, Mr. Israel T. Hatch and Mr. James W. Taylor, who had made investigations of the operation of this law since its enactment. The report of Mr. Hatch was decidedly unfavorable. He quotes with approval the following from the letter of Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State under President Jackson, in regard to trade with the British Colonies in North America:

> The policy of the United States in relation to their commercial intercourse with other nations is founded on principles of perfect equality and reciprocity. By the adoption of these principles they have endeavored to relieve themselves from the discussions, discontents, and embarrassments inseparable from the imposition of burdensome discriminations. These principles were avowed while they were yet struggling for their independence, are recorded in the first treaty, and have been adhered to with the most scrupulous fidelity.

In the same connection he quotes the following from the report of Thomas Jefferson, as Secretary of the Treasury, in 1793:

> Should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantages by continuing the system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce, and navigation by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations, nor are they likely to produce relaxation of them.

Speaking of the Elgin treaty of 1854, Mr. Hatch then adds:

> The leading idea of the treaty itself was to permit the introduction of the products of one country into the other free of duty, and consequent reciprocal benefits were expected to follow both. * * * No statesmanship could, however, foretell the workings of the treaty, or had a right to anticipate legislation adverse to the spirit. Correct in principle as the treaty itself was, the perversion of its spirit and the disregard of its substance on the part of Canada have produced results it is the province of this report to exhibit.

Mr. Hatch shows that after the provisions of the treaty went into effect the value of the free imports from Canada to the United States increased from $380.041 in 1854 to $13.703.748 in 1859, while the imports paying duty decreased from $6,341,498 in 1854 to only $313,953 in 1858. He also shows that the value of goods exported by the United States into Canada, and paying a duty, fell from $13,449,341 in 1854 to $8,473,607 in 1858, while the value of goods going free of duty from the United States into Canada increased from $2.083.756 in 1854 to $7,161,958 in 1858. He shows also that Canada, pending the life of the Elgin treaty, violated its spirit, if not its letter, by increasing the Canadian duties imposed upon manufactured goods from the United States very materially, and observes:

> This legislation occurred at a time when, without asking for any equivalent, we had reduced our duties on Canadian manufactures 20 per cent. Before this, desirous of rendering "our commercial relations reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory," we have conferred upon Canada benefits shared by all classes of her people. We gave to her farmers highly remunerative prices, and brought their lands and productions upon an equality with our own, and thus greatly increased the value of their homesteads. Through their agriculture, we aided every branch of their industrial occupation, though we thereby left the most important points of our trade in the hands of those among whom hostile traditions are not yet wholly distinct. * * *
> The increase in the profits of the Canadian farmer, since the treaty, is well known on both sides of the frontier. The large amount which would have accrued to the United States in the form of duties has gone to his benefit in the increased value of his products and real estate. The production of many articles has been greatly stimulated, much to his advantage, and their importations have been severely felt by our own producers along all that line of frontier through which access is naturally sought in an eastward course to our cities, manufacturing districts, and the great highway of the world. * * *
> Contrary to the belief commonly held at the date of the treaty, the Liverpool market does not determine the standard of value for breadstuffs on this side of the Atlantic. European prices are now far from being remunerative to the American producer. They have seldom been profitable to us since the termination of the Crimean War. Reopening the Russian granaries threw the Russian serf into close competition with the American farmer, who can only sustain himself by his superior intelligence and the application of modern labor-saving implements of agriculture. * * * All the wheat and flour sent by us in 1858–59 to England, where flour is charged with a duty of 4½ pence per hundredweight, or about 16 cents a barrel, and a corresponding duty is levied on grain, was only $1,736,152 in value, or less than half of $3,665,502, the amount thrown on our market from Canada, notwithstanding the failure of her crop.
> The grain-growing regions of the Northwestern States have suffered more than other parts of the Union from a depression of prices in our Atlantic cities, thus caused by the influx of Canadian products.
> A temporary cheapness of transportation will not compensate for reduction in the value of grain; and Canada, by virtually prohibiting the importation of American manufactures, prevents, so far as she is able, an increased demand and consumption of breadstuffs within the limits of our confederacy.

I have been reading from the report of the special commissioner made after a full investigation of the effects of the Elgin treaty, dated March 28, 1860, published in Congressional Document No. 1350, printed under an order made February 2, 1911.

The treaty of 1854 secured freedom of navigation on the St. Lawrence River to citizens of the United States and a recognition of their right to fish on the coasts of the British North American Provinces, but those features, which aided that law, have no place in the trade agreement of 1911.

On December 14, 1863, Hon. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, one of the ablest and most distinguished friends the American farmer ever had, introduced in the House of Representatives a joint resolution giving notice of the termination of the Elgin treaty. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and favorably reported on April 1, 1864. Mr. Ward, of New York, who made the report, on presenting it to the House, among other things, said:

> General dissatisfaction with the treaty exists along the whole of our northern frontier near Canada, and the moral and political effects which it hoped would result from it have been destroyed, the effect of the Canadian tariffs exacted since 1855 having been to decrease very materially the amount of manufactures and goods of foreign origin sold by the people of this country to those of the Provinces. * * * During the past five years the export of manufactures of the United States to Canada have in the aggregate decreased from $4,185,516 in 1858–9 to $1,510,802 in 1862–3.

Mr. Pike, a Member of Congress from Maine, spoke thus of the treaty:

I confess I am impatient of delay. I desire this treaty to draw its last breath as soon as possible. Had it much longer to live in order to die a natural death, if that be not paradoxical, I should be disposed to use violence and destroy a life which, in my judgment, has been productive of so much injury. It was a creature of mistaken views and of expectations which had no basis in fact. Its workings have been a continuous and protracted disappointment. It has achieved no considerable result which was predicted for it, and I ask attention of the House for a short time while I exhibit its utter failure in all particulars which should render a commercial arrangement with a foreign country desirable to us.

Mr. Baxter, of Illinois:

Within 12 months after this reciprocity treaty—as by an infamous misnomer it is called—went into operation real estate in Canada rose 25 per cent, and within 12 months thereafter it rose 50 per cent. And why? Because my neighbor from the Canadas could go to our market any morning with me in the same car and receive the same price that I could get for my produce, without incurring any of the burdens which I have to bear.

The joint resolution terminating the treaty passed the House December 13, 1864. Allison, Blaine, Henry Winter Davis, Lott M. Morrill, Thaddeus Stevens, and Elihu B. Washburne voted for it. There were 85 yeas and 57 nays.

On December 18, 1864, the joint resolution was reported favorably by Mr. Sumner in the Senate for the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Sumner said:

The people of the United States have been uneasy under the reciprocity treaty for several years; I may almost say from its date. There was a feeling that it was more advantageous to Canada than to the United States; that, in short, it was unilateral. This feeling has of late ripened into conviction.

Mr. Sherman favored the termination of the treaty. With his accustomed good sense and practical wisdom he remarked:

My vote shall be controlled by one idea alone; and that is that it is now the interest of the United States, in a pecuniary sense, to terminate this treaty. * * * Nations in their commercial intercourse are always governed by their interests, and especially is this so with Great Britain. It is admitted to be so by all her distinguished statesmen. She has always been guided by her interests as a nation, precisely as an individual in the ordinary affairs of life would be guided by his interests. * * * When the reciprocity treaty was adopted in 1855, there was then a state of things along the border which induced both parties to cultivate kindly relations and the exchange of commodities between them.

I have no doubt that Great Britain got a great deal the best of the bargain, especially in the schedule of articles named which should be exchanged free of duty. The treaty has operated from the beginning against our interests; and it can be plainly demonstrated by the tables which are furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury that from the beginning our trade has fallen off and theirs increased, comparatively.

The amount of goods exported to Canada in 1855, subject to duty, was $11,449,472, and in 1862 no more than $6,128,783. * * * While the goods we received from Canada came to us duty free, except a very insignificant amount, they charge us duty on more than half of what we send them. Can that be said to be reciprocal? * * * While this treaty stands it is a discrimination against every farmer and against every mechanic and every industrial interest in the Western States. The farmer in Canada may raise his grain and produce and send it to our markets free of duty, and it pays no tax. We can not reach their railroads; we can not tax their transportation; we can not affect them in the least; and yet every interest of our farmers is taxed. It is manifest therefore that while we maintain our present system of internal taxation the reciprocity treaty is a direct benefit to the Canadian producer, farmer, and mechanic, and it is a discrimination against our own farmers and mechanics.

The resolution terminating the treaty passed the Senate January 12, 1865. Senators Chandler, Collamer, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Ben Wade, and Henry Wilson voted for it. There were 33 yeas and only 8 nays.

And so, Mr. President, after trying a similar arrangement with Canada for 10 years, the Congress of the United States by overwhelming majorities in each House terminated it by joint resolution, which was approved by President Lincoln January 18, 1865.

The decree of history and experience has been of record against this proposal for 46 years. It is true that the United States has grown and that she has taken her proud place as a "world power" since then. But the Dominion of Canada has grown also, and is seeing the first dim outlines of a great empire growing rapidly under her northern skies. It was found that the admission of farm products from the Provinces of the Dominion into the United States was a one-sided agreement, detrimental to the best interests of the United States then.

The changes which have occurred since 1865 make such an agreement equally unfair and discriminatory against us now.

In 1892 President Harrison refused to entertain a similar proposal by Canada, because, he said:

A reciprocity treaty limited to the exchange of natural products would have been such only in form. The benefits of such a treaty would have inured almost wholly to Canada. Previous experiments on this line have been unsatisfactory to this country. A treaty that should be reciprocal in fact and of mutual advantage must necessarily have embraced an important list of manufactured articles and have secured to the United States a free and favored introduction of these articles into Canada as against the world, but it was not believed that the Canadian ministry was ready to propose or assent to such an arrangement. * * * It must be accepted, I think, as the statement of a condition which places an insuperable barrier in the way of that large and beneficial intercourse and reciprocal trade which might otherwise be developed between the United States and the Dominion.

This was the opinion of President Harrison against a similar proposal of Canada in 1892. The changes which have occurred since 1865 and 1892 have strengthened rather than weakened the objections so potent as to defeat it then.

Mr. President, it has been hinted in some places that the opposition of the farmer to the enactment of this law is an artificial one, caused by interests other than his own, and that it is the result of a systematic and organized effort of politicians, of lumbermen, and of certain corporations, who have deceived and misled the farmer. No claim could possibly be more unjust. I have received many letters from actual farmers in South Dakota protesting against this law and only a very few favoring it. The letters opposing it do not come from politicians nor corporations, but from actual farmers, who state their objections in their own way.

I ask permission to print in connection with my remarks some tables based upon the census of 1910, from which I have made quotations, and some of the protesting letters and petitions I have received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In order that this bill may be really and truly reciprocal, rather than a one-sided law, which will allow the trusts of the United States to profit at the expense of the farmers of the United States, it should be so amended as to admit the manufactured products of Canada free of duty along with the natural products. To accept less is to discriminate unjustly against the American farmer and in favor of the American manufacturer and the American trust. I offer such an amendment and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

A law like the one which has been proposed here, except that it was a better one, because it put flour on the free list, and secured the free use of the St. Lawrence River, and the right to fish in the waters adjacent to the Canadian Provinces by citizens of the United States, was found, after 10 years trial, to be so unfair to the people of the United States that it was repealed by a decisive vote in 1865.

Now, why should we undertake to repeat in 1911 the error of 1854—46 years later?

During these 46 years the modern monopolistic trust has come into our commercial life; it has crushed out competition; it will appropriate all the benefits that can flow from this law if enacted in its present form; no relief will come to the ultimate consumer; it will depress American agriculture and intensify the congestion of our population in great cities. The opposite course should be taken.

The trust should be held in check; congestion in the cities should be relieved; the open spaces in the country should be occupied and made to yield harvests and support homes. Profitable returns in the pursuit of agriculture will take our people back to the farm. Profitable returns will keep them there. Nothing else will. The great Department of Agriculture and the State agricultural colleges, assisted by Federal appropriations and the work of experimental stations, have made the pursuit of agriculture a science where brain, as well as muscle, is essential to its mastery. With profitable returns for the labor and intellect bestowed, the calling of the farmer becomes dignified as well as independent. But all depends upon its yielding him a fair profit. Unless it does that, his sons will yield to the lure of the city. We are at the parting of the ways. The policy of the Government is now to be definitely determined. The issues are momentous. If this is to be henceforth an urban Nation—living as England lives, where 26,000,000 of her 38,000,000 live on imported wheat, and 13,000,000 live on imported meat, which, put in other words, means, as Mr. Mallock tells us, that her whole population lives on imported meat for nearly five months of the year, and on imported wheat for eight months of the year—if we are ready to admit that this is to be our destiny in the United States, and that we shall ransack the world for our food and not depend upon the American farms for it, then I say agriculture will go down in this country, and with it will begin the permanent decay of our civilization. And if we have decided to maintain a protective tariff upon manufactured products, while exposing the products of our farms to free trade with their greatest world competitor, our conduct is the strongest possible admission that we have reached that melancholy conclusion.

I protest against it because, in my opinion, it is a cowardly abandonment of a grave duty and obligation we owe to the future as well as to ourselves. Necessity has not yet pushed us so far. We owe much to the soil of this favored land. We must not fail to give it our allegiance now. The farmer has fought a good fight, and is always and ever pushing on. By drainage and by irrigation, by intensive processes, and by reclamation, through crop rotation and the use of fertilizers, he is opening new fields and restoring waste places. He is always working at the base of the triangle. He was the Nation builder. He is the home builder. When he fails, all is lost. These great cities, these vast railways, these enormous combinations of wealth, these stock and commission gamblers will not remain long when the American farmer gives up the fight. How, then, can we make so fundamental a change in our policy toward the farmer with such seeming indifference? How do we dare do it when it is clear that the trusts, and the trusts only, will profit by the change?

The farmer will resent it, and the workingman, when he finds that it has given no relief to him, will resent it. Those who believe that a policy should be followed which will protect the American producer against foreign competition to the extent of the difference in cost of production at home and abroad by tariff duties will find that a fatal breach has been made in the system they would maintain and that it will speedily fall into disuse.

Instead of leading in the system which is developing an empire in Canada, and which enables Germany and France to keep first place in the world of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the United States will follow England in a policy which, in many ways, is adapted to the needs of the two small islands known as Great Britain, but which is not adapted to the needs of a nation like ours, the possessor of half a continent, with infinite possibilities in the yet undeveloped resources of its soil; the adoption of a policy in which the country is to yield forever the scepter of power and influence to the city; a policy which will soon change the entire character of our institutions and the quality of our citizenship.

I hope the attempt may fail now, but should it succeed, temporarily, I can not believe that the American people will permanently abandon the policies which, in three generations, have witnessed her advancement from a feeble beginning to the first place among the nations and peoples of the earth.

PETITIONS OF PROTEST.

Petition from Dempster Grange No. 4, dated at Dempster, S. Dak., March 22, 1911, requesting delegation to vote against reciprocity bill and use every effort to prevent ratification of same. Signed: A. J. Loats, jr., master; Mrs. E. V. St. John, secretary.

Petition against reciprocity signed by 103 farmers of Coleman, S. Dak. Petition is based upon the following grounds:

1. The schedule proposed provides for free trade on all that the northwestern farmer produces, while retaining almost full protection, as heretofore, on all that farmers have to buy. Practically all the concessions that have been made to Canada are made at the direct expense of the American farmer.

2. The schedule gives Canadian competition free trade in American markets for grain, but still protects flour; free trade for live stock, but still protects the packers in their meat; free trade on all the farmer's crops, but still protects the Canadian manufacturers against American competition in Canada. (See Schedule B.)

3. The immediate effect of the proposed law would be to encourage American farmers to move into Canada, where the virgin soil still produces greater crops of grain with less labor than can be produced on our farms in the Northwest. The result will be to decrease land values in the United States and to enhance land values in Canada at the expense of United States investments. It will result in many localities in creating abandoned farms in northwestern States and will retard the development of Wisconsin, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Montana, and Idaho, causing a loss in land values in these States amounting to millions of dollars.

4. More than half of the tillable land in all of these States yet remains uncultivated, and we declare to the American Congress that so long as the policy of protective tariff continues to be the policy of this country the agricultural interests have just as much right to protection of home industry and home investments against unequal foreign competition as have the manufacturers or any other interests. Signed: J. P. Renge, Coleman, S. Dak., and over 100 farmers.

Also resolutions of protest by 200 farmers and business men of Clark County, S. Dak., protesting against the passage of the proposed Canadian trade agreement bill as unfair to the farming interests of the State and country.

Also, petition setting out the same grounds, and signed by C. E. Withan and 20 farmers of Amherst, S. Dak.

Also, petition from the Black Hills Pomona Grange, of Whitewood, S. Dak., signed by Charles C. Maas, master; Elvina Benoit, secretary.

This petition and protest declares that the members of Black Hills Pomona Grange are opposed to the reciprocity treaty with Canada, which is directly against its interest, and declares in favor of "a tariff for all or a tariff for none"; that it puts and extra burden on the shoulders of the farmer by allowing Canada to compete with him in the open market with her raw agricultural products, putting a tax upon all finished products, which will in no way aid the consumer, but which shows a spirit of paternal favoritism toward the manufacturing class and a most flagrant disregard for the welfare of the agricultural class. Requests United States Senators to use every reasonable effort to prevent the passage of the law.

A petition to the same effect from the White Grange, White, S. Dak., signed by Charles Gile, master; S. L. Gile, secretary.

Also, protest against the passage of the reciprocity bill, signed by Herbert Watzek and 18 farmers of Crandon, S. Dak.

Also, protest signed by Otto Johnson and 152 farmers of Redfield, S. Dak. This protest reads as follows:

REDFIELD, S. DAK., March 3, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Are we farmers helpless, or will we get a square deal in the Senate in this reciprocity bill? When we elect our Senators we expect them to be fair to farmers as well as to the trusts and railroads. Why is the farmer citizen of the United States more prosperous than the farmers of the foreign countries? Because the American farmers are protected by the high tariff.

The last few years the Government has been trying to teach farmers to conserve the natural resources of the soil. Now they are working in an opposite direction. The farmers will not hire as much help as usual if the prices of farm products are lowered, and consequently our farms will not be worked as they ought to be.

And also of late years there has been a great deal said about going back to the farm, and which was coming fast, but if this reciprocity bill will pass the Senate there will be a check to the movement.

Why do we want grain from Canada when we are an exporting country ourselves? Some will claim that the farmer will be benefited by it, but they can not pull the wool over the farmers' eyes with such a flimsy argument as that.

Now we know that the Canadian farmer can produce a bushel of grain cheaper than we can, for the reason their land is cheaper and their yield larger and the quality is better, so we object to competition with them.

Now we trust that you will do all you can to get a square deal for us. We the undersigned farmers and citizens of Spink County are opposed to the passage of the reciprocity bill. If it should be passed at all, we are in favor that everything will be put on the free list as it is between the different States and not only be favoring the trusts and railroads.

We are also in favor that Mr. Taft and all other men favoring reciprocity with Canada, should they want an office in 1912 we believe their names would appear better on the Democratic ticket.

Also protest against the passage of the law by Watertown Grange, No. 3, of Watertown, S. Dak., signed by George W. Dixon, master; Ellen Poor, secretary.

The grounds upon which the protest is made are the following:

1. The bill provides for the admission free of duty of all Canadian farm products. Since Canada is the only country from which any considerable quantity of these products can, under any circumstances, be imported, this would result in practically free trade in everything the farmer produces.

2. While putting farm products on the free list the reciprocity bill makes no material reduction in the high tariff rates on all the manufactured articles the farmer buys, and therefore gives no relief from the heavy burden of taxation imposed by these duties.

3. The theory on which our protective policy has always been defended is that all classes and interests are equally entitled to protection. The farmers, however, receive much less protection than the manufacturers, for while farm products are taxed on the average about 25 per cent, manufactured articles are taxed on an average about 45 per cent.

4. The enactment of the Canadian reciprocity bill would still further discriminate against the farmers by abolishing the comparatively slight protection now given them, while leaving the high protective duties on manufactures practically untouched.

5. The Canadian farmers, by reason of their lower general tariff and their preferential trade arrangements, can buy manufactured goods at lower prices than those prevailing in this country. The prices of farm lands in Canada are also much lower than in the United States. These conditions give the Canadian farmers an advantage over us, and the free admission of their products will subject us to unfair competition.

6. We hold that the farmers should receive exactly the same measure of protection as is given the manufacturers, and that there must be no reduction of duties on farm products, either by reciprocity or tariff revision, unless the duties on all manufactured articles are at the same time correspondingly reduced.

7. To show that this reciprocity measure is not an honest effort to reduce the cost of living in the interest of the consumer, it is sufficient to point out that while wheat is on the free list, flour is taxed 50 cents per barrel, and that while cattle, sheep, and hogs are free, meats, both fresh and cured, are taxed 1¼ cents per pound for the benefit of the Meat Trust.

As the adoption of the proposed reciprocity law would be a serious injury to the farming interests of this country and would greatly reduce the value of our farm lands, while increasing the value of Canadian farms, we earnestly protest against its enactment.

Protest in the same manner is also made by the following farmers: A. Brink, Frankfort; C. R. Walworth, Westport; Henry Dalgaard, Beresford; O. R. Schmeling, Watertown; and John Bottcher, ———.

Protest from Erwin Grange, No. 5, Erwin, S. D., which reads as follows:

We, the Patrons of Husbandry, implore you to vote for the revocation of the Canadian reciprocity treaty made by our Executive and Canadian officials. As a faithful servant of the people of this State you are by duty bound to cause this treaty to be revoked, firstly, because its burdens fall most heavily on this and other agricultural States, and, secondly, because it is unjust to the people as a whole, in so far as it is an unjust and partial regulation of commerce between the States and Canada. We will not detain you by going into details, as you have the original treaty before you. Thanking you in advance for your prompt action upon this matter, we remain,

J. F. WOLKOW, Committeeman.
Mrs. CLARA B. HODGES, Master.
F. G. LARSON, Secretary.

Also, protest from Florence Grange, of Florence, S. Dak., signed by George Moody, master; W. R. Hayden, Secretary.

Also, protest signed by C. G. Loriks and 55 farmers of Oldham, S. Dak. This protest states that the reciprocity act with Canada would mean an immense blow to the present market of the farmer for our largest asset, the production of small grains. Canadian grain has almost direct access to the large milling and grain market of Minneapolis.

Protest signed by N. L. Sateren and 62 farmers of Roberts County, S. Dak. This protest sets forth the following grounds of objection:

1. The bill provides for the admission free of duty of all Canadian farm products. Since Canada is the only country from which a considerable quantity of these products can under any circumstances be imported, this would result in practically free trade in everything the farmer produces.

2. While putting farm products on the free list, the reciprocity bill makes no material reduction in the high tariff rates on all the manufactured articles the farmer buys, and therefore gives no relief from the heavy burden of taxation imposed by these duties.

3. The theory on which our protective policy has always been defended is that all classes and interests are equally entitled to protection. The farmers, however, receive much less protection than the manufacturers, for while farm products are taxed on the average about 25 per cent, manufactured articles are taxed on an average about 45 per cent.

4. The enactment of the Canadian reciprocity bill would still further discriminate against the farmers by abolishing the comparatively slight protection now given them, while leaving the high protective duties on manufactures practically untouched.

5. We hold that the farmer should receive exactly the same measure of protection as is given the manufacturers, and that there must be no reduction of duties on farm products, either by reciprocity or tariff revision, unless the duties on all manufactured articles are at the same time correspondingly reduced.

The farmers have been the last to feel any direct benefit from protective tariffs. Why should the protective party expect the farmers to be the first to suffer the loss of the protective policy?

6. To show that this reciprocity measure is not an honest effort to reduce the cost of living in the interest of the consumer, it is sufficient to point out that while wheat is on the free list flour is taxed 50 cents per barrel, and that while cattle, sheep, and hogs are free, meats, both fresh and cured, are taxed 1¼ cents per pound for the benefit of the Meat Trust.

We, the undersigned, therefore earnestly appeal to our Senators and Representatives in Congress to defend the agricultural interests of the Northwest against this unfair and misnamed species of reciprocity, at least until the same principle of free trade can be applied to what the American farmers have to buy that is now proposed upon what American farmers have to sell.

Protest in identically the same language as above and signed by Joseph Pleet and 6 farmers of Roberts County.

Protest of the American National Livestock Association, Murdo McKenzie, president, and T. W. Tomlinson, secretary, of Denver, Colo., dated February 13, 1911. The executive committee of this association is composed of 70 men who are leading cattle and ranch men and stock raisers in that part of the United States west of Chicago. The members of this committee are scattered through the States and Territories of Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming.

The association favors a nonpartisan permanent tariff commission and opposes the tariff agreement with Canada.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY PROPOSAL—LETTERS FROM SOUTH DAKOTA FARMERS AGAINST IT.

OLDHAM, S. DAK., February 11, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing you herewith a petition regarding the reciprocity act now in session, and you will note that the farmers of this vicinity are rather of the opinion that it will affect their markets for small grain and that it should be taken into consideration. Kindly advise me what you think of our petition and if you will be able to assist us in the matter.

Yours, truly,

———— ————,
Farmer.

HERREID, S. DAK., February 20, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The inclosed clippings from Up-to-Date Farming, of Indianapolis, Ind., express my views and also of other citizens of this county in regard to the impending reciprocity law between the United States and Canada. I heard you make a speech at Pollock, S. Dak., at the time you were candidate for Senator, and from your speech I took it that you were a sincere friend of the farmer, and I hope you will be able to see that there will be a great wrong done to the poor or working people of the whole United States, not alone the farmer, if this reciprocity bill becomes a law. It is an open-faced fact that very few farmers become millionaires, even with the little protection that we have had so far, and now that it is about to be of some benefit to us, steps are to be taken to deprive us of it. We have had a very hard time of it here so far, with the prices which we have been receiving for our farm produce. This year in Campbell County, S. Dak., we had a short all-around crop on account of the drouth, and it is making it hard already for the farmers to make ends meet even after having had three quite successful years and good prices besides.

Some people tell us that farming is the most independent occupation on the face of the earth. It may be, but let those people try farming, and they will find that there are quite a few expenses attached to farming. When one piece of machinery is paid for, another one has to be replaced, and so it goes on. We are compelled to produce more than we consume ourselves or lose our homes, and if we can not get good enough prices when seasons are good to help us through a poor year, then we go backward.

I have been farming for 20 years and have worked hard, not loafed, and have not spent money foolishly, and part of the time my wife has been our hired man, so as to make ends meet, and still we have not been able to put anything by for that rainy day.

Now, I am not against this reciprocity bill from a selfish interest, just because I am a farmer and would benefit us, but I am sure it would benefit all, even the big millionaires, if this bill does not become a law, because if a farmer is not able to buy all other business must in time come to a standstill also, and the wage earners would not be able to eat bread even if wheat were only 25 cents per bushel, and all other stuff in proportion.

How is it in China, India, and other countries where people can live on less than half or one-fourth what it costs here in the United States? They starve by the millions with plenty around them, simply because they do not have the price to buy with. I understand that this is a so-called pet bill of our Hon. President William H. Taft, and I hope he is not trying his best to get this bill passed because he has any special grudge against the farmers and wants to kill them off; if so, he might better bunch us all up and turn a few of the modern guns loose on us, as we would rather be put out of existence at once than in the miserable way the reciprocity law would. Well, we are hoping for the best and expect you people that have us in your hands to use us right, and if in any way you see that it is best to favor that bill be dead sure of it before making so serious a mistake.

Respectfully,

———— ————,
Farmer.

HIGHMORE, S. DAK., February 22, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose a signed clipping from the Breeders' Gazette and trust you will do all in your power to defeat that reciprocity bill in the Senate. I am one of the county commissioners of Hyde County, and there are thousands of farmers throughout the Northwest that do not want to see that bill passed. If passed, it would be a detriment to the entire Northwest, as we can not compete with Canada raising grain. While it probably would not hurt us much this year, there would be years when it would affect the price of wheat at least 15 or 20 cents per bushel.

Yours, truly, ——— ———, Farmer.

HURON, S. DAK., February 13, 1911.

To Senator COE I. CRAWFORD, Senator ROBERT GAMBLE, Representative CHARLES H. BURKE, Representative EBEN MARTIN, of the South Dakota delegation in Congress.

HONORABLE SIRS: Your constituents have been taught that protection was a justifiable policy of this Government; that this market was "ours"; that the products of the farm were entitled to equal protection with the manufactured article; that one was a necessity to the other.

As we understand the proposed reciprocity treaty, we will divide this market with others who do not contribute toward our revenues, all to furnish a market for the finished article of manufactured enterprises fostered and protected at our expense. If wheat is admitted free, the dealers in flour can't expect nor receive the protection the unfinished product is deprived of. If cattle, hogs, sheep, etc., are to be admitted free, why should the Meat Trust receive protection? If logs and rough lumber be admitted free, why protect the Lumber Trust on finished lumber? If free trade (or what is practically the same) should prevail on raw material, causing the farmer of the United States to share his loaf—his market—with the Canadian farmer, why not relieve the farmer from the tax on manufactured articles? Knock off excessive duties upon trust-made articles and destroy illegal combines.

Respectfully, yours,

———— ————, Retired farmer.

MITCHELL, S. DAK., February 6, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are very much in hopes that you will vote against the measure which contemplates removing the tariff on farm products between the United States and Canada, and we hope you will not only vote against it, but use your best efforts to defeat it.

If the tariff is removed it will mean that the farmers of South Dakota will be compelled to market their butter at 6 cents per pound less than they would otherwise secure for it, as the Canadian farmers have a big advantage over the producers in the West and Central West. The eastern portion of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where dairying is carried on more extensively than in any State in the Union, are very close to our leading markets, therefore they can deliver their butter in New York, Boston, etc., in about half the time required to deliver butter to those points from South Dakota. Consequently the Canadian butter would arrive in a much fresher condition and at a very much lower transportation expense; and, if I am not mistaken, farm lands and farm labor are not nearly as high in Canada as in South Dakota. Therefore the Canadians will be able to outsell your constituents, not only on butter, but numerous other farm products, and the result will be that South Dakota farmers will suffer severely and the value of their lands will be lowered materially.

If I understand it correctly, each Representative in Congress looks after his own constituents, and I am very sure that you appreciate the fact if you could interview every farmer or, in fact, every voter in South Dakota that you would find that 95 per cent of them would be unalterably opposed to the removal of this tariff.

I know it is an utter impossibility to induce a farmer to write a letter to his Representative in Congress expressing his desires; therefore it is not likely that you will hear from many of your constituents on this subject. At the same time these same farmers will spend an hour on the street corner condemning a measure of this kind, but would not take 10 minutes to express their views to you in a letter; but the writer is sure that if you will take the welfare of your constituents into consideration that you will agree with me that your efforts should be directed toward defeating this bill, and I will be pleased to have you advise me whether we can depend upon your assistance in this matter.

Very truly, yours, ——— ———,

Manufacturers of Fancy Creamery Butter and Wholesale Dealers in Butter, Eggs, and Poultry.

DOLAND, S. DAK., February 14, 1911.

COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hope you can vote against the Canadian reciprocity pact now pending before Congress as it now reads. While it admits all farm products free of duty it makes no material reduction in articles manufactured. The supporters of the bill claim it will help the high cost of living by admitting farm products free and at the same time say it won't hurt the farmer. The farmer fails to see this. While the farmer has been protected on an average of 25 per cent the manufacturers were on an average of 45 per cent. The Canadian reciprocity removes the farmers' protection while leaving the manufacturers' protection practically untouched. I do not see where it will help the high cost of living much to the consumer. It will, no doubt, help the manufacturers. They put wheat on the free list and 50 cents per barrel on flour, live stock on the free list and 1¼ cents per pound on fresh meats, 2 cents per pound on bacon, 15 per cent ad valorem on farm machinery, etc.

The farmers should receive the same measure of protection as the manufacturers. There should be no reduction on the duties of farm products unless duties on all manufactured articles are at the same time correspondingly reduced. The farmers emphatically protest against the present Canadian reciprocity pact. I hope you will use your influence to defeat this measure. If the farmer prospers, others prosper with him. I thank you for voting against the ship-subsidy bill.

Very respectfully,

———— ————, Farmer.

GROTON, S. DAK., February 15, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: The farmers hereabout are greatly alarmed to think that reciprocity with Canada might be established, the result of which would be to reduce the price of all small grain, especially wheat, from 5 to 12 cents a bushel in the Dakotas, for the Minneapolis and other mills now need this wheat to make good flour.

While it temporarily might help Minneapolis manufacturers and the railroads it certainly will seriously injure the farmers of the Northwest. Some claim it would reduce the price of living, yet the people of the Northwest were never better fed and clothed than they are now. We now can and do employ more labor at $30 to $45 a month than we did when wheat was from 40 cents to 50 cents a bushel at $15 to $25 per month. As the welfare of the State depends on the farmers, we hope to find you on our side.

Respectfully, ——— ———, Farmer.

HANKINSON, N. DAK., February 15, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

To our honorable Senator in Congress, COE I. CRAWFORD:

I take the liberty in writing you in regard to reciprocity treaty with Canada, as such an act, should it pass and become a law, would harm us farmers of your State and also bordering State, where we depend on grain and agriculture to a very great extent.

Trusting that you will use your influence and endeavor to do all in your power to prevent said treaty from becoming a law. You are no doubt familiar with our conditions, as we are getting poorly paid now for our work. As you are aware, my post office is Hankinson, N. Dak., but my home is in South Dakota.

———— ————, Farmer.

SELBY, S. DAK., February 1, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to Canadian reciprocity, am strictly opposed to it in the form as now proposed. I am a farmer. Tariff has never protected us before, and just as we are to derive some benefit from same, and right after passing one of the most unjust tariff laws, it looks kind of rank. We farmers, as a whole, were in favor of downward revision, and would have taken any and all such revision without a kick. But now, after protecting the trusts, then turn around and hit us like that. Looks like you were trying to hit us little fellows because you are afraid of the big fellows. You throw us a lumber bone to make us chaw and choke on. Why, bless you, we have never seen a piece of Canuck lumber, and that $1.25 should not have prohibited them from showing us what it looks like. No; give us a square deal and you bet we will stuff our pipe in the sack and keep it there. I see one of the dailies proposed that we farmers better take this because it would give us the whip. Such rotgut as that seems pretty small to a fellow up in a tree. It ain't a decent business proposition. Give us a decent deal and we won't squeal.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———, Farmer.

MADISON, S. DAK., February 4, 1911.

HONORABLE SIR: The neighbors around here asked me to write you that we would like a square deal in the tariff. If what we grow has to be free, all what we have to buy should be free, too. A farmer works hard for what he gets. Why take it from him? Also would like parcels post.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———,
Farmer.

WHEATLAND, N. DAK., February 10, 1911.

Senator COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose a statement about farming and a resolution. Please read it carefully over. I suppose you are on our side. We farmers need the same protection as the manufacturers. We pay the same high wages and have the same competition, and more so. We have the board of trade and gamblers on our neck, from which the manufacturers don't suffer. If this Canadian treaty goes through, it will be the worst blow we as farmers and a nation ever received from our party. We want equal rights and justice.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———,
Farmer.

IRENE, S. DAK., February 7, 1911.

Hon. Mr. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There is now pending before the House a treaty with Canada providing for the removal of duty on grain, cattle, and hogs, placing the northwestern farmer on a free-trade basis in competition with foreign countries. I, as a citizen and voter of South Dakota, ask you to vote against this measure.

Yours, truly, ——— ———,
Farmer.

R. 2, CASTLEWOOD, S. DAK., February 11, 1911.

Senator CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: All these years since the beginning of the settlement the farmers have been paying high tariff, with all its results, on everything we had to buy. Now, when the time comes that we may expect some benefit of the tariff on farm products, it is proposed to put all such things on the free list. It is the most unfair thing in the history of American politics. Hoping you will see fit to fight for us, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

N. E. KNIGHT, Farmer.

(No date.)

Hon. C. I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I and the rest of the farmers see with regret that President Taft tries to force through a free trade between Canada and the United States on certain articles, of which all grains are the principal ones. The reduction on lumber to our advantage would not amount to $1 a year to the average farmer, and on every load of grain we sell he will receive several dollars less. He will thereby sacrifice and cripple the interest of the farmers of the Northwest, and he will not deserve a vote for his renomination from us. I hope you will work with all your might to defeat and modify that measure. I know your fighting qualities, and I hope you will use them in our interest.

Yours, truly, ——— ———, Farmer.

COLMAN, S. DAK., February 17, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: Since all eyes are now turned on the Senate of the United States, I take the liberty to write you for your encouragement the views of a South Dakota farmer on the reciprocity agreement between the United States and Canada. These views I have taken from every conceivable angle and drawn my conclusions accordingly.

What will we gain by opening our markets to the Canadian farmers who produce the same things as we do? In looking over the list of things placed on the free list we discover but one article—lumber—which, if placed on the free list, might come cheaper to the farmer after passing through the hands of the Lumber Trust by perhaps a dollar a thousand feet, and as the average farmer will not use to exceed a thousand feet per year, he might save from that source a dollar a year, while on the other hand all his products would be cheapened by increased competition, President Taft's statement to the contrary notwithstanding, for is it not the avowed purpose of this agreement to reduce the cost of living, which means a reduced price for farm products? As I understand this agreement, the American farm-implement manufacturer is permitted to ship farm machinery into Canada duty free, to be sold to the Canadian farmer cheaper than we buy them at home, yet at a larger profit to the manufacturer than he now obtains. The Canadian farmer, on cheap land with cheap machinery, comes in open competition with the farmer on this side on high-priced land with high-priced machinery.

The people of South Dakota do not want free trade and are quite satisfied with conditions as they are now, as well they may be, because they never were more prosperous, as, indeed, are the people of the whole country.

Then, why do anything that will at once change this prosperity to adversity? To be sure the prices of farm products are high, not too high; so also is labor high and well employed, as is proven by the high cost of living, for if the laborer, who is the principal consumer of farm products, had not the money to buy with we could not get good prices and consequently could not prosper—a condition which we too well remember obtained back in the nineties, caused by the same experiment that is now being proposed in this Canadian agreement. Who wants a repetition of those times?

Quotation from a speech delivered by Coe I. Crawford at Brookings in 1896: "This free-trade experiment (referring to the Wilson bill) has cost the farmers of this country, in decline in value of farm animals and farm crops, the enormous sum of $1,483,829,574."

Now, then, is it any wonder we are alarmed and afraid of anything that looks like another experiment in free trade? "It is a fool who won't learn from experience."

I do not need to remind you that had we wanted free trade, or partial free trade, we would have voted the Democratic ticket. If the manufacturing interests think they can deal the farmer such a body blow without hurting themselves, they are mistaken, for as our products cheapen our power to buy goods from them diminishes, and as the western farmer is the best customer of American factories, demand for their goods decreases, which would soon lead to closing factories and putting labor out of employment, while the Canadian farmer, with his increased power to buy, would still buy most of his goods from old England.

The adoption of this agreement or anything else at this time would materially reduce the price of farm products, would spell "r-u-i-n" to a great many farmers of the Northwest—I mean those who have recently bought farms on the present high-priced basis, paying from one-fifth to one-third down (all their hard-earned savings), expecting by hard work and saving habits to sell enough products at present prices to make a living and meet future payments. Failing in this, they would be compelled to seek new homes in Canada, where land is cheaper and farmers more favored.

We are opposed to this agreement because it places all our products on the free list, while everything we have to buy is still protected. By placing barley on the free list brewers will be able to buy our barley dutyless; the Canadian farmer will not be benefited any, but American brewers will, at our expense. (Score one for millionaire brewers.) Live stock free listed, cured meats still protected. (Score one for the millionaire packer.)

We are opposed to this agreement because it seems to be one step toward a well-laid scheme to increase the purchasing power of the rich man's dollar at the expense of the poor man's labor, for when the price of a product is lowered the price of the labor required to obtain that product is lowered.

On reading comments of different advocates of the "pact," we notice that while some claim it will not injure the farming interests, none of them have the nerve to claim that it will benefit it.

President Taft, in his Springfield speech, defending his position, says: "This form of agreement can be withdrawn at any time by changing the statute by legislation." One thing sure, Canada won't want to withdraw, as they have everything to gain and nothing to lose. As to this country withdrawing, imagine, if you can, a Republican President asking a Democratic Congress to repeal a Democratic measure, which the Republican President has advocated and caused to be enacted, then you will have an idea how long we would be recovering from such an experiment.

Then, I say, if this free-trade experiment must be tried, let the Democrats try it, shoulder the responsibility, and abide by the consequences, for I do not see how any party or faction could remain long in power after committing such a blunder. I will close by saying that this community is of one mind in expecting our Senators to do all they can to protect the farming interests of South Dakota. Fair play and a square deal is all we want.

Yours, truly,

———— ————, Farmer.

GROTON, S. DAK., April 8, 1911.

United States Senator COE I. CRAWFORD, Senate, Washington, D. C.

A mass convention of about 300 farmers unanimously passed resolutions unalterably opposed to proposed reciprocity pact with Canada. Letter and resolutions follow.

———— ————, Chairman.

HOLMQUIST, S. DAK., April 4, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: I see your hard labor is again beginning. We appreciate very much your great work in the interest of the producers of our great Northwest. I regret very much that Gov. Vessey did not have a resolution passed in our State legislature against the proposed reciprocity, as it does not give us one penny advantage to the farmers of the Northwest. It would be far better to have everything on the free list with Canada than is now proposed. President Taft is taking away the only advantage of protection the Northwest has, and is giving us nothing in return. The West and the Northwest will demand that if they are forced to sell their products in an open and free market, they will also ask the privilege of buying in a competitive or free market. It is a staggering blow to the producers of the soil and the development of our own great Northwest, which can not compete with Canada, which has less taxes, cheaper labor, material, and land. We write this in the view to encourage you in your struggle for our cause.

Yours, very truly,

———— ————, Farmer.

ELLIS, S. DAK., April 2, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Although I know and see you are against reciprocity, I understand you would support it under certain amendments of your own. Whether this is true or not, I do not know. As a resident of South Dakota for 33 years and a careful student of its great resources and undreamt of wealth as an agricultural State, I, with thousands of my fellow farmers and tillers of the soil, are against any such move at this or any other time, and we can see no necessity for such. As a member of the legislature as State senator I know if such a resolution would have come to a vote in either house of that body it would have been overwhelmingly defeated, as the sentiment of the common people of our fair young State is opposed to Canadian reciprocity. Now, as an agricultural State we excel. But it is impossible for us or any other State to compete with Canada's cheaper products. Dealers in every commodity will buy in the cheaper markets. Canada is just across the road, as one might say, and the cost of transportation will be even less than from remote points within our own trade territory, and Canadian farmers are bound to shut us out, or compel us to sell at a lower price the products of our farms which are identically the same as that which the Canadian farmer raises, for Canada can in every instance produce cheaper than we can. It is the American farmer that has brought the products of the farm up to the standard of what it is to-day, and we must in every instance—cost what it may—be protected. As farmers we have toiled a lifetime, and when the evening sun begins to shine upon the white-capped cerebrum of us makers of empires, we—few of us—can retire from active work and toil and live comfortably the declining days of the life allotted to us.

We find as we investigate that by arts known to skilled manipulators that the cost of bread, pork, and other necessaries of life remain substantially the same to those that have to buy. These are facts that can not be disputed and have shown up more distinctly in late years.

Here we can plainly see it is capital, and capital alone, that will be benefited by reciprocity, and no one else.

And now, my dear Senator, I could say much on this subject, but you know it is against our wishes, and hope it can be stopped and killed forever. Town meetings, board meetings, and bodies of various kinds have signed petitions, and thousands of names will be sent in protesting against it. But now I will stop and hope you will be on the firing lines against anything that will come up over the Canadian line to take the place of our own. Wishing you success, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

———— ————, Farmer.

ALBEE, S. DAK., March 21, 1911.

Senator COE I. CRAWFORD, Huron.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to congratulate you upon the stand you have taken against reciprocity with Canada. All I have seen in Grant County congratulate you, especially the farmers. In its present form it is a great thing for the millers of Minneapolis. We began to prosper and get good prices for our produce and land raised in value. If reciprocity passes Congress, wheat will go down to 50–65 cents per bushel, barley 30 and 40 cents, and we will have to struggle for our existence and support the rich, and this comes from a Republican President to work for a bill to sit down on the common people and help the rich. Mr. CRAWFORD, continue in the path you have taken and the people will be on your side.

Very respectfully,

———— ————, Farmer.

SISSETON, S. DAK., March 20, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD.

DEAR SIR: I write to ask you to do all you can to defeat Taft's reciprocity treaty with Canada. We, as farmers, are very much opposed to this treaty, and every farmer we meet has the same talk. We are very much opposed to this treaty that intends to put us against the cheap wheat and barley of Canada and makes us buy our groceries, clothes, and machinery under high protection. The farmers never did have a square deal, and this treaty will only drive more boys and girls to the cities to become factory slaves. I inclose some letters clipped from the farm papers. Hoping that this treaty can be defeated, I am,

Yours, truly,

LEOLA, S. DAK., March 4, 1911.

COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to tell you of something I should like the Government to do. First, I should like very much to see Canadian lumber on the free list, as I think lumber companies are charging enormous profits; have not made up my mind on reciprocity, as I have so far been unable to find statistics on same.

Second. Should like to see subexperiment station established about center of each county, which should be used as county farm also.

Yours, etc.,

———— ————, Farmer.

DE SMET, S. DAK., April —, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

I am writing you to ask you to help us out on the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada by casting your vote against it. In asking you to do this I am not only giving you my opinion, but am voicing the sentiment of every farmer that I have discussed the matter with. I see nothing but the grossest discrimination in the agreement. Nearly every article mentioned in the list becomes protected after leaving the hands of the producer. Give us absolute free trade with Canada and we will take our medicine. I might mention several other reasons, but will not take your valuable time, but feel certain you will see the sense of our position and help us to defeat this unreasonable compact. Thanking you in advance, I am,

Yours, truly,

——— ———,
Special Correspondent Dakota Farmer.

ERWIN, S. DAK., April 3, 1911.

Mr. COE I. CRAWFORD, Senator of South Dakota.

DEAR SENATOR: Knowing that the special session of Congress called for April 4, 1911, is for the purpose of acting on the reciprocity treaty with Canada, it is a great injustice to the farmers of the Northwest, in fact, to all producers and consumers of foodstuffs.

Our doctrine is, "A tariff for all, or a tariff for none." We ask you to use your influence and vote to help defeat the said treaty.

Very respectfully, yours,

——— ———,
Master Erwin Grange.

BRYANT, S. DAK., April 1, 1911.

To the honorable United States Senator CRAWFORD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the reciprocity treaty with Canada I wish you would do all in your power to defeat it. I am sure you will. If it should pass, it will make a worse panic than 1893. We feel the effects of it now. Business has come to a standstill. I do not see why Taft ever proposed such a treaty, unless it is to favor the trusts. If the farmer does not prosper, how is the rest of the world going to prosper? J. J. Hill says anyone that is opposed to it is a demagogue. Now, if I understand the word, he is a genuine demagogue of the first water. He says there is only a few cents difference in price of grain here and Canada. I was talking with a man from Canada, and he says the most they ever paid for 1911 wheat was 85 cents, when we got $1.05. Why is it that the only time the farmer was benefited by the tariff they are taking the bars down? We have been contributing to the trusts so long that they have got so strong that it is hard to down them. Now, if they would take the duty off manufactured products, it would do lots more good than to take it off of farm products. I do not think Taft could get a single vote in the Northwest, nor any of his fellows. Hoping the treaty will be defeated, I remain, as ever,

——— ———, Farmer.

VALLEY SPRINGS, April 5, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to enter my protest against the passage of the so-called Canadian reciprocity treaty, also any lowering of the tariff on wool. This Canadian deal is certainly rank. If we farmers can't have a square deal, I am in favor of free trade with the world. If this bill becomes a law, President Taft and the Republican Party are "goners" just as sure as the sun shines. I can get you a petition signed by practically every man in my township protesting against this treaty. Trusting that you will use every honorable means in your power to defeat this unfair measure, I am,

Respectfully,

——— ———, Farmer.

DOLAND, S. DAK., April 3, 1911.

COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.:

Inclosed find clipping from the Dakota Farmer, showing the injustice of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada, which about fits the Northwest, especially South Dakota. Hope you will stay by us, as you have done in the past, and oblige.

Yours, etc.,

——— ———, Farmer.

MITCHELL, S. DAK., March 17, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Huron, S. Dak.

DEAR SIR: The writer has understood that if Canada removes the duty on farm products which now exists between Canada and the United States that they will be compelled to remove the duty on farm products coming from other countries as well. If that statement is correct, it would seem to me as though the passage of the reciprocity agreement would create havoc with the dairy industry of the United States.

I had it figured out that if the statement made at the beginning of this letter is true that the Canadians could import butter from New Zealand, Denmark, Australia, Siberia, and elsewhere for their own consumption and ship the products of their dairies into the United States, which would virtually amount to the same thing as though the duty on butter was removed between the United States and the countries above named.

It is a well-known fact that Denmark, New Zealand, and Australia can produce butter at a very much lower cost than can the farmers in the United States, and if the butter market in the United States should be high enough to pay the farmer to produce it the Canadians would import cheap butter for their own use, take advantage of the markets in the United States for the butter which they produce in Canada, and thereby shut off the American farmers' outlet for this product. This, of course, wouldn't be likely to take place if the United States market were around 15 to 18 cents per pound, but if the market should get that low the farmer could not produce it without sustaining a loss, and consequently he would be driven out of business.

I am inclosing a clipping herewith, which is along the same line of reasoning, which has been occupying my mind for some time, and it is possibly a new feature to you, and I trust you will give it some attention and thought, and it seems to the writer that every Senator who has the slightest desire to see the dairy business prosper, even to a reasonable degree, can not but realize that the passage of the reciprocity agreement would simply ruin the dairy interests of this country.

Yours, truly,

Manufacturers and Dealers in Butter.

SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK., February 11, 1911.

DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith clippings from the Argus Leader, containing two letters of mine on the subject of Canadian reciprocity. I am pleased to see that the South Dakota delegation in Congress will oppose the treaty. Its passage, in my opinion, would be a calamity to the Northwest. Wishing you success in the fight, I remain,

Yours, truly,

Lawyer and landowner.

CHAMBERLAIN, S. DAK.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am opposed to the Canadian reciprocity treaty. It does not deal fairly by all classes.

Yours, truly,

SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the treaty with Canada, I think it is very bad for the farmers. In Mr. Hill's speech in Chicago he says that the treaty with Canada would not and could not affect the price of wheat, as we have to compete with the markets of the world. Mr. Hill—does he forget the speeches that he has been making for the last two years, where he says that the farmers of the Northwest would have to improve their method of farming or they would not be able to feed the people of the United States at the rate they are increasing? In other words, just at the moment that the farmers of the United States could derive some benefit from the existing tariff Mr. Taft would have it removed. This would be an insult to the farmers; still, would make Mr. Hill millions, could the tariff be removed, by hauling Canadian wheat into Minneapolis.

Yours, truly,

——— ———,
Farmer.

HAMBURG, S. DAK., February 9, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Allow us to make this statement in regard to proposed reciprocity: Seemingly we all like to be protected, though only our own production. The other party's industry may see how it comes along. High-living prices without doubt point to speculative manipulation in farm products, as far as they are concerned. Our wheat and barley products, which are marketed two-thirds to three-fourths in September to November around 50 cents and 70 cents, later in the season, when on the other side of the mill and big elevator, get well up, but have passed the producer. Beef sold in cities averaging twelve and fifteen is sold by the producer here at two and a half and three and a half. Pork is up until we have a new supply. Butter and eggs product down one-half. Reason evident. While labor, tax, mode of production, supplies keep fairly pace with principle of protection, though for the sake of that principle we are asked to let our protection drop.

Now, is there anything in the line of tariff protection from the soft, warm wool to the hard, cold steel that the farmer, living as he does in this latitude, could get along without and so shirk his end of the burden?

And now only one season, with only local drought, has swept these States, and another more general, and where is our imaginary prosperity? To reason, luxury and exaggerated high fly are poor signs of prosperity. Deterioration by either crop failure or legislation for this country spells exodus, impetus to the city and to Canada.

Yours, truly,

——— ———, Farmer.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I come to you in an humble way and ask you to try and put your power against the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada, for it would fail to do any good to the farmers of the Northwest.

Yours, truly,

——— ———, Farmer.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: How do you like the President's position on Canadian reciprocity bill? He thinks all cereals should be admitted free of duty, but holds that manufactures should have duty about as high as they now enjoy. I suppose he is influenced somewhat, because his own State is more interested in manufactures than it is in agriculture. If it is good to help the Canadian farmer by admitting his wheat and other products free of duty, why not give their manufacturers the same good?

The motive back of the whole thing is the interest of our manufacturers. They want cheaper food for their labor and conclude the way to get it is to admit Canada's agricultural products free. It is shown by a careful investigation of the cost of production that the average price of wheat is not equal to the cost of producing it.

Now, on this showing, is it right or just to force the American farmer to a lower price? Again, see what an impetus the additional price would be to the Canadians. Their wheat lands are very much cheaper than ours are, hence the very material difference in the cost of production to them. There may come a time in the distant future when the difference in the cost of production will not be so great as now. It will then be soon enough to come to their rescue by lowering the duties on their cereals.

This notion of sympathy that the manufacturers are trying to work up as between the two countries is all nonsense. We have our own interests to care for, just as Canada has, and let us see that they are cared for. We have succeeded as a Nation by keeping up our own interests and letting other people do the same. Why not continue in the good work? The farmers are not ready to take the duty off their products yet.

Why should they not be permitted to choose the time of the removal of the duty and not permit the manufacturers to choose for them? Treat all interests alike.

Yours,

——— ———, Farmer.

ASHTON, S. DAK., April 4, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: * * * I hope that our delegation in Congress will do what they can to defeat the reciprocity pact, at least in its present form. If passed, it will not only be a hard blow on the Dakota farmers, but also will greatly endanger the Republican policy of protection. The manufacturing interests—labor as well as owner—must not expect that the largest body of workers will stand for the cutting off of duties on everything that they produce and not result in similar action as regards articles which they must buy.

Yours, truly, ——— ———, Farmer.

SINAI, S. DAK., April 7, 1911.

Hon. COE I. CRAWFORD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find a petition against the proposed Canadian reciprocity. The farmers are opposed to it to a man. Some of the reasons for same are given in the petition. These signatures were obtained in less than two days. Not a man refused to sign. The same sentiment, I believe, prevails throughout the State and the entire Northwest. Hoping that your interest and ability will be used in fighting this unjust measure, I remain,

Yours, truly, ——— ———, Farmer.

LEOLA, S. DAK., April 7, 1911.

COE I. CRAWFORD, Esq., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since receiving yours of March 12 have seen considerable in the newspaper concerning Canadian reciprocity. Now, I am selfish, as well as most other men, and as I am a farmer I should be pleased to have you do all you can to keep everything off the free list that would be detrimental to farmers. You speak of our being an exporting country of wheat, hence no harm to put that on the free list, but since this reciprocity treaty has been talked I notice wheat has gone down about 10 cents per bushel in Minneapolis. Fall, I think, caused by reciprocity. I should like to see the tariff remain on wheat, horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, and meats. Let farmers have their innings awhile. They have been the under dog long enough. I should like also to see a parcels-post law passed.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———, Farmer.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 18, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for that silent yet potent influence ever going out from Thee to Thy children, leading them onward and upward to the things which make for Godliness in thought and action. Make us more susceptible until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions of Arizona and New Mexico as amended.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose only of putting into the RECORD what I consider to be a very strong statement in favor of Canadian reciprocity by Mr. H. E. Miles, of Racine, Wis., secretary of the National Association of Manufacturers. While I by no means agree to all the conclusions reached by the gentleman whose article I shall put in the RECORD, yet it is a very strong and striking statement of the case, from one standpoint at least, in favor of Canadian reciprocity. I now ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD in this regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY AND THE TARIFF.

FOREIGN TRADE, RECIPROCITY, AND CANADA.

RACINE, WIS., March 29, 1911.

Good as is the proposed treaty of reciprocity with Canada, it is a mistake to think of it only in itself. Rather it is to be considered as the first definite step in a program of international trade expansion quite beyond present calculations.

M'KINLEY RATES EXCESSIVE.

The McKinley tariff was in many respects the highest our country has ever known. Said Col. George Tichenor, general appraiser, and right-hand man of McKinley in the shaping of the McKinley bill: "The controlling idea in the preparation of the McKinley bill was to dispose of and prevent the accumulation of surplus revenue. It was in that view that duties upon certain articles were made prohibitive, upon others higher than they otherwise would have been." The actual rates in the bill support this statement. The marvelous development of our great industrial aggregations and their profits confirm it. The defeat of McKinley's party in the next election showed what the people thought of it. This action by McKinley forms an interesting answer to those ultra protectionists who urge high rates as necessary to the securing of necessary revenue. McKinley knew that high rates (excessive rates) decrease revenue by decreasing imports, in many cases to the extent of prohibition.

DINGLEY RATES ESPECIALLY PROVIDED FOR RECIPROCITY.

Notwithstanding the McKinley rates were excessive, the Dingley rates were made much higher. Mr. John Ball Osborne, head of the treaty-making division of the State Department, has said that the Dingley rates were made just 20 per cent higher than the McKinley for the purpose of trading them off in treaties of reciprocity. The statement is not quite exact, however, as I found by an exhaustive comparison of all rates in both bills. The Dingley law did, however, provide that the President might negotiate treaties of reciprocity with all nations and lower the Dingley rates at his discretion up to 20 per cent in those treaties. The Dingley law was made with that in view. Senator Dolliver declared upon the floor of the Senate, in substance: "The Dingley rates were made high for the purpose of trading them off. I was a member of the committee that framed the bill and know whereof I speak." Confirmation is unnecessary, for the text of the law specifically so provided.

M'KINLEY SOUGHT RECIPROCITY.

With these Dingley rates unnecessarily high, Mr. McKinley, then President, entered eagerly upon a program of trade expansion. He declared that he expected that these trade treaties and the consequent enormous increase of our foreign trade would be the chief accomplishment of his administration. He was greatly grieved and disappointed when the Senate refused to confirm the several treaties which he submitted, known as the Kasson treaties, and especially as he found no reason to believe that other attempts, however successful, would be ratified by the Senate. The overprotected interests, having gotten the 20 per cent increase, were unwilling to return any part of it to the people for any consideration. The Dingley law limited to two years from the time of its enactment the period within which the treaties could be made. The interests had, therefore, only to prevent ratification in the Senate for these two years in order to benefit by the unintended increase from that time to this.

Few utterances in our history will be longer remembered than McKinley's last pathetic plea for reciprocity, at Buffalo, immediately preceding his assassination. A century hence it will be better appreciated than to-day, as will also the greed of those who have stayed the Nation's progress these 15 years.

THE PAYNE LAW AMPLY PROVIDES FOR RECIPROCITY.

The Payne law is, in substance, the Dingley law reenacted. The changes, whether "upward" or "downward," are mostly immaterial, like the reduction on sugar, from 72 per cent to 71 per cent. We are substantially on the Dingley basis of 15 years ago, with the 20 per cent still in, though our manufacturing efficiency is greater and our need of high rates is less and our need of foreign outlets is greater.

On the other hand, our population has wonderfully increased, while our natural resources have been much depleted. At this particular moment our factories are running short-handed and many of them short hours. This is no time for aught but confidence and optimism. It is nevertheless true that our factories need orders and their operatives will be short in wages this year by hundreds of millions of dollars.

For these and other reasons President Taft, and with McKinley's later and broader vision, and quite of his own motion, has opened again the door of opportunity, and it is inconceivable that Congress and the people will for a moment think of closing it again.

CANADA FIRST.

It is particularly fortunate that the first treaty is with Canada, which best deserves it. With only 8,000,000 population she is our third best customer, and if cotton is excepted she is our second best, surpassed only by Great Britain with its 50,000,000 of people. Mr. Osborne estimates that this treaty will almost immediately increase our trade with Canada some $200,000,000.

THE OVERPROTECTED INTERESTS OBJECT.

There are only two objections made to this treaty. The first comes from the overprotected manufacturers who see in this beginning a release of the American people from exploitation through excessive rates, that are not protective in any fair sense, but are discriminatory and unfair. The present treaty touches no such rate and the objection is therefore only because of the notice they get between the lines that those rates will be protected when opportunity offers. Indeed, President Taft offered to lower such excessive rates upon finished products of manufacture in this treaty.

THE AGRICULTURAL SCHEDULE.

The second and more interesting objection comes from our farmers. Our farmers seem not to know that they sell their products on a free-trade market and that their advantage from protection comes wholly from the diversification of our industries and the development of an enormous home market through the demands of the factories and their operatives for farm products. This is compensation enough for the granting of a reasonable and adequate protection.

So far as the agricultural rates in the tariff go our farmers have been bought with counterfeit money these many years. A vast amount of their products go abroad, as wheat, flour, meat, etc., and the price of grain on every farm in the United States, and equally in Canada, Russia, and South America, our competitors, is the Liverpool price, the price in that common market where the produce of all export countries meet—it is this Liverpool price, less freight and sundry profits and charges from each and every farm to that common market. The difference in price of wheat, for instance, between Winnipeg and Minneapolis, is not greater than the difference in price between many American States and other States immediately adjacent, as, for instance, Oregon and California, Missouri and Arkansas, differences explained as above, further modify in our country occasionally by the great local demand of millers and brewers, this latter modification, however, by no means great enough to affect international conditions. The extent to which the farmer has been fooled in the rates given him is amusing when reduced to figures. In 1907, for instance, as I remember, we had a billion-dollar corn crop. Our agricultural population of 40,000,000,000 souls was protected on that crop by duties collected on imported corn in the munificent sum of $1,450—not enough to build an average good farmhouse for a newly married couple, much less to equip the average farm with the power conveyers, cream separators, gasoline engines, and other labor-saving devices that now make farming a science and a delight.

Meat may be described as "condensed corn." What our farmers want is not protection against the very limited production of corn and food animals in Canada, but a reciprocity treaty with Germany and other European countries whereby the latter countries will admit enormous quantities of our cheaper grades of meat to their market. With what grace can we ask Germany, for instance, to accept our cattle when the German rates are not one-fifth as high as our own on imported cattle? Germany is ready any day to negotiate, with a prospect of doubling her orders for our food products.

In 1907 we produced more than 735,000,000 bushels of wheat. During the same year we exported $60,000,000 worth of wheat, and during that year we imported only $16,000 worth, or less than enough to feed one-fourth of the population of the city of New York one day. With those facts before him, and the Dingley tariff providing for a duty of 25 cents a bushel, Mr. Aldrich, who appreciates a good joke, proposed to raise the Dingley duty to 30 cents in the Payne bill.

In that year (1907) we produced nearly 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn, or more than 78 per cent of the entire world's supply, with exports exceeding $44,000,000 worth of this cereal, and another vast amount in the form of meat, and we imported less than $8,000 worth, and the farmer was tickled by the idea that he was protected by a duty of 15 cents a bushel. The extent to which we may dread Canadian competition is indicated by the fact that she produces only one-sixteenth of 1 per cent as much corn as we.

So with oats. In 1907 we exported $1,670,000, our exports rising as high as $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 when we can spare it, and our imports in 1907 were valued at $17,000, or not enough to feed the horses of a small town, and yet Mr. Aldrich proposed to raise the Dingley duty from 15 cents a bushel to 20 cents.

Buckwheat: With a domestic production of buckwheat flour of about $4,500,000 in 1904, and imports in 1907 of $683, or less than a month's supply of a good-sized bakery, it was proposed to raise the Dingley rate of 20 per cent, which no one needs and still less cares for, to 25 per cent.

Rye: Production in 1907, 31,000,000 bushels, and imports valued at $125, or about enough to supply a boarding house. Mr. Aldrich proposed to raise the duty 100 per cent, from 10 cents a bushel to 20 cents.

Take eggs: Duty 5 cents per dozen, domestic production in 1904 estimated at over $144,000,000. Our exports in 1907 exceeded $1,500,000; on the other hand, we imported a mere handful of $26,000.

No one objects to giving the farmer the benefit of such protection as he may need, but a joke is a joke, and it's time the farmer caught onto this one. As I remember, the Dingley duties on agricultural products was substantially unchanged in the Payne bill. There has been, however, always the thought in Washington in some quarters of giving the farmers foolishly high rates which he can not use, by way of inducing him to permit of similar excessive rates to other interests that can use excessive rates to the limit.

And so we might go through the whole list. Says Senator NELSON, of Minnesota, a lifelong Republican and protectionist, who owes his seat in the Senate to a constituency of farmers:

"Mr. BORAH. How much wheat does your State produce?

"Mr. NELSON. I do not recall the millions of bushels produced in the State of Minnesota, but I desire to tell these Senators that the tariff on wheat which is on the statute book has not done us a particle of good. It would be like a tariff on cotton, because up to this time we have been exporting from 150,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. The price of our wheat is fixed by the Liverpool price, the export price, and no duty up to this time has helped us. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 10, 1909, p. 1949)."

WE SHOULD NOT INSIST UPON MODIFICATIONS.

The newspapers tell us that Senator CUMMINS will insist upon a modification of the treaty so as to admit highly finished manufactures like woolens, cottons, and agricultural implements free to our market. Such a modification would doubtless be in line with President Taft's first endeavor. As a manufacturer of agricultural implements, I know the cost to be the same substantially in both countries. The second largest manufacturer of these implements in Canada tells me his cost is lower than the cost in the States. The third largest says the cost is the same. The Canadian farmer pays about 20 per cent more for his implements than the farmers south of the boundary. This is a great injustice to the Canadian users, and a handicap to those hardy men who are opening up Canada's outer Provinces.

The American makers will welcome reciprocal reductions to any extent; but to admit the Canadians free to the States and leave the Americans paying 15 per cent entry into Canada would be the height of impolicy and injustice. The Canadians make too little to affect our prices by their importations. They charge higher prices than we. Beyond making clear representations, we must await Canada's action and the time when the Canadian farmer will force relief for himself from those very exactions on his implements, which Senator CUMMINS and others of us object to when practiced by some American manufacturers upon American consumers.

So in other manufactures, as many countries have waited patiently and with unbelievable courtesy for reasonable action on our part in the interest of our consumers, we must accept an altogether just and helpful treaty, although there are further extensions to be desired and to be expected. To reject this treaty is to lose all prospect of later betterment as well as the advantages now clearly offered. Canada has too great self-respect to be again rebuffed.

And we must respect Canada, too, if she is overcareful of her manufacturing interest, as we also must ever be, for revision must never rush to the point of possible injury of great industries.

WE ARE NOVICES IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE—OUR MANUFACTURERS DO NOT GET THEIR SHARE.

There are only four great manufacturing nations in the world—England, France, Germany, and the United States. In volume of product the United States is far and away in the lead. Outside these four nations there are one and one-half billion human souls who look to these nations for their manufactured supplies. The rewards offered in this world trade are beyond comprehension. They are to be measured in money, in intellectual advancement, in national spirit, in heightened civilization, and yet in this world trade the United States has, until now, refused to participate. We have made our tariffs not protective, but prohibitive, in the majority of items, and in many ways we have served notice upon the nations that it is our policy to restrict international trade, rather than to promote it.

The total production of mine, soil, and factory in the United States is of the yearly value of $26,000,000,000; the production of manufacturers only is about $15,000,000,000; of this $16,000,000,000 of manufactures we exported in the year 1907–8 a total of $1,082,000,000; of this $1,082,000,000, the greater part, or 63 per cent, consisted of crude and semicrude materials to the total of $680,000,000;[1] there is left as our exports of more highly finished manufactured products $402,000,000. This is only one-sixtieth of our toal production and about one-fortieth of our manufactured product.

NATURAL RESOURCES DEPLETED.

We are not in the race. As a people we are ignorant of foreign trade. Lost in the by-places of England, I have learned more of world trade from notices on the walls of little post offices than I could from the officials of some of our largest cities.

It has been aptly said that America is little else than a huge stevedore—bearing down to the ships of the sea crude and semicrude materials for the employment of the capital, labor, and intellect of foreign nations. Exportation of these partly manufactured materials is a depletion of our natural resources, the heritage of the ages in mine, forest, and soil fertility, never to be restored. Those who are best informed see within a period, which to the far-sighted is only as a day, our wonderful country importing these same materials and our producers handicapped by excessive cost.

We have been proud of our great agricultural exportations, but our scientists now give us reason to question to what extent even those exportations have permanently enriched us. We are told that every bushel of wheat exported carries 27 cents' worth of phosphorus, every bushel of corn 13 cents, and each pound of cotton 3 cents. These figures fairly represent the supposed profits. To-day our best agricultural States, even those only 50 years under cultivation, yield only half as much per acre as the 1,000-year-old soils of Europe. We have been capitalizing soil values to an extreme and hurtful extent, where we thought we were making real and substantial profits. There were reasons in the past for these exportations of various raw and semicrude products, and we have, on the whole, splendidly prospered, but those reasons are no longer effective.

WE MUST EXPORT MORE OF FINISHED PRODUCTS.

Now, we must use every effort to send our products abroad ready for consumption, carrying the maximum and not the minimum of American labor and skill. Think of the difference in the amount of labor carried by a typewriter and a bar of iron, a planter and a billet. We ship our cotton abroad raw at 14 cents per pound. We buy some of it back in fine handkerchiefs from the thrifty Swiss at $40 per pound, all labor. The exports of England, Germany, and France are finished products, mostly labor; most of ours carry only enough labor to make them fit for ship's cargo.

Our labor is in many respects the most efficient in the world. We are proud of our "men behind the guns"; their brothers, the men behind the machines in our factories, have no less of ability and the courage of accomplishment. There is brains in a Remington typewriter, a Singer sewing machine, and in American shoes. These are already exported in volume and point the way for tens of thousands of other products which can be made as welcome in foreign markets. These show, too, that high-paid American wages are cheap wages.

As then-President Roosevelt said to the writer three years ago, "We have become an industrial Nation and must acquire world markets for our finished products." Such markets broaden the industrial base of operations and will infinitely lessen the hurt of domestic stringencies and panics, which in the world sense are often local.

As says President Farrell, of the United States Steel Corporation:

"The producing capacity of this country has reached a point far exceeding the consumption, and the ratio of cases is assuming greater proportions each year. It is therefore imperative for the manufacturers of this country to look beyond its borders for markets wherein they can profitably dispose of their manufactures. The possibilities for the consumption of American products in the markets of the world have long been realized by the greatest statesmen as well as the leaders in the economic and commercial enterprises of our country. To everyone engaged in foreign commerce there comes a broader knowledge of human affairs and a better understanding of the relations of men and of nations and their relations to each other than comes to those who are solely engaged in domestic or local enterprises."

THE OCEAN NO BARRIER.

The ocean is not a barrier to trade. Rather, it is the easiest, cheapest, and freest of all highways. Instead of separating the nations, it now makes them all neighbors.

Freight has been carried from Pittsburg to Liverpool as cheaply as from Pittsburg to Chicago. Mr. Hill has carried foodstuffs from Minnesota to Japan at as low charge as from Minnesota to New York. Coal is carried from Cardiff to Port Said for 75 cents per ton, some 6,000 miles. Ocean charges are about one-fifth those of the railways.

Governments all barter through trade treaties—or, as we call them, treaties of reciprocity—for nations now invariably assist their citizens in these ways. Germany is the perfect example, which we are the last of all her competitors to follow. She made a high tariff (one-fourth as high as ours) and then, by special treaties of 12 years' duration, she secured special trade privileges in all countries, and she has had peace with honor and great prosperity ever since.

The English alternative of free trade is impossible to us and abhorrent.

Let us to a man support the administration in this tardy action and make it impossible for unfriendly influences to again shut the doors of opportunity.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LANGHAM] to use some time now.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, after the very interesting and profitable display of fireworks yesterday, it will seem like coming from the sublime to the ridiculous to come to the consideration of such a subject as this, and yet I dare say, Mr. Chairman, that there has not been before this House or will not be before this House at this session of Congress any measure of more vital importance than the one now under consideration; and for fear I should forget to say this later on in my remarks, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am here to speak in favor of the admission of the Territory of New Mexico as a State, and I am here to speak in favor of the admission of Arizona as a State. I believe that the American people are weary of the methods that have been followed out in Congress for the last 40 or 50 years with reference to these Territories, and particularly with reference to the Territory of New Mexico. Some 60 years ago the people of this Territory made application for admission into the Union as a State, and from time to time that application has been renewed. They have been knocking at the doors of Congress, and finally an enabling act was passed, and Members here know much more about that than I do, because it was not my good fortune to be here. However, an enabling act was passed, and under the direction of that enabling act a constitution was formed by the people of New Mexico, and that constitution was reported back to the last session of the preceding Con-

[1] These semicrude materials included the following:

Foodstuffs partly or wholly manufactured, flour, etc	$331,968,382
Manufactures of copper in bars, wire, etc	104,064,580
Manufactures of iron and steel, like bars, billets, and rails	48,118,682
Petroleum and other mineral oils	97,651,326
Crude manufactures of wood	62,706,194
Crude manufactures of leather, furs, and fur skins	34,682,482

gress, and, as I am informed, received the absolutely unanimous support of this House.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA SHOULD BE ADMITTED NOW.

I have read with great interest the eloquent speeches which were made by distinguished Members of this body in favor of the admission of New Mexico with the constitution as it existed then and as it exists now, and I say, Mr. Chairman, that for one I am opposed to any action by this body that will further delay the admission of this Territory as a State into this splendid Union. [Applause.] I said a moment ago I was in favor of the admission of Arizona as a State. I am. I hope that before this session of Congress comes to an end we shall have two more great States added to this splendid galaxy. [Applause.] And I hope, sirs, that both of those States will be added in such a manner and with such constitutions as not to be out of harmony with the spirit of American institutions, and for that reason, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen—and I refer to this now not with the idea of discussing it, because other and much abler Members are to discuss that phase of it, but simply to make my position clear—I am for the admission of Arizona now, and I am in favor of the admission of that State with a constitution that shall be in harmony with the spirit of American institutions as they have been shown by a century of experience, and therefore I am opposed to the recognition and approval by this distinguished body of any such un-American institution as the recall of judges. [Applause.]

For that reason I am heartily in favor of the report that is made to this body by the minority of the Committee on Territories. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about the constitution of New Mexico. I shall direct my remarks particularly to that subject. It has been attacked here. It has been attacked in committee. As I say, I supposed when I came here that there would not be any question about the admission of that State. The constitution has been passed upon by the preceding Congress, and able and distinguished gentlemen now upon this floor upon the other side of the House have made speeches in favor of the admission of that State, and I supposed there would be no opposition to it. And that idea was carried out, I might say, still further when I saw a copy of the resolution that was introduced here by the distinguished chairman of this committee, and with whom I want to say that I regret very much to have to disagree, because as a new member of that committee I feel under particular obligations to the chairman for the consideration he has given to the "baby" members of the committee—my distinguished friend from Michigan, here, and myself.

Mr. RAKER. As one of the members of the committee, I understand the reason you are opposed to the admission of Arizona is because of the recall of judges?

Mr. WILLIS. Now, let me answer that part of the question——

Mr. RAKER. I have not finished my question.

Mr. WILLIS. I beg pardon. Proceed, then.

Mr. RAKER. Are you in favor of Arizona recalling all other officers save and excepting the judiciary?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman, as I have said before, that I am in favor of the admission of Arizona as a State when it has provided by amendment to its constitution that the recall shall not apply to judges.

Mr. RAKER. Now, will the gentleman yield to this question? The first thing to determine is, Are you opposed to the recall of the other officers?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, well, I will say to the gentleman that I am not on the witness stand. It does not make any difference what my personal views are upon this, or what the views of the gentleman are.

Mr. RAKER. The only reason I want to make the distinction is, if you are not in favor of the recall of the rest of the officers, what distinction do you make in the recall of the judges?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman that I will reach that in due time. But I think that I make my position sufficiently clear when I say to him, whether I like every provision in the Arizona constitution or not, I am willing to admit Arizona; I want to vote for the bill to admit Arizona, with the single exception of the recall of judges. I do not believe in the recall of judges. [Applause.] I believe it will make a weak judiciary when a man sitting on the bench, instead of considering the law and the facts, is put in the position where he has to find out what is being said about this proposition in the corner groceries and at the pink teas all over the country. Therefore, I am opposed to the recall of judges. Now, if I have made my position clear, I would like to go on.

Mr. RAKER. Are you in favor of the election of judges?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman can figure that up for himself. I have said twice, and I thought I said it in a tone of voice loud enough to be heard, though possibly not, to my friend from California, in perfect good nature, without going into his preferences or my preferences, that the question at issue is not what any Member thinks on any question of constitutional law, but the question is, what are we going to do for these Territories? And I am in favor of New Mexico just as it stands, just as it has been ratified by unanimous vote of this House, and without playing politics. New Mexico ought to come into the Union.

Mr. RAKER. Are you in favor of the election of judges?

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will kindly come to me I will give him instruction on that point. It does not make any difference whether I am in favor of the election of judges or not. I am in favor of the admission of New Mexico as a State now and the admission of Arizona as a State now, with the exception of the recall of judges. Now, if that does not make it clear, that is all there is to it.

MAJORITY FOR NEW MEXICO'S CONSTITUTION.

Now, then, a question was asked here the other day that I think ought to be answered by somebody. That question had to do with the vote on this question. The idea had been held out here that there has been some hocus-pocus about this business, that the people of New Mexico are not qualified for statehood, and that this thing has been foisted upon them. I am here to speak in behalf, so far as I can, of the good people of New Mexico and the work they have done in making a constitution, and here is good evidence of what they think about it. Here is the statement of Gov. Mills before the committee in the preceding House. Copies of this are obtainable, and I want to say to the gentlemen on the other side that it could not possibly be that there is any unfairness in this constitutional convention. That could not have been. Perish the thought! And by the way, I want to tell you this, because some one will say before this discussion is concluded that this is a boss-ridden and corporation-ridden Territory, and they will give as an illustration of that the fact that some one who was once connected with a railroad in the capacity of an attorney was the president of the convention.

I call the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House to the fact that there could not possibly have been any wrong, there could not possibly have been any corruption, there could not possibly have been any friction or wrongdoing of any kind because this constitutional convention in New Mexico did not allow its chairman to appoint the committees. These committees were selected by a committee on committees, and consequently everything must have been fair and right [laughter and applause on the Republican side], just as in this House we have had it exemplified upon this floor in the pyrotechnics across the aisle. [Laughter.]

Now, I am going to give what is said here by the governor of New Mexico. Here is an election in which something over 45,000 votes were polled, as is shown in the certificate already before the committee. The number of votes cast in favor of the constitution was 31,041 and the number cast against the constitution was 13,399, making the majority in favor of the adoption of the constitution 18,000 out of a total vote of about 45,000. Here you have a majority of 18,000. That is an expression of the will of the people of New Mexico, and I want to say to Members that there was brought out in the hearings before this committee, and they were very extensive hearings——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my friend from Mississippi always.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman object to stating just here what the expression of the people of Arizona was on that constitution?

Mr. WILLIS. I would be delighted to inform the gentleman on that point, but I do not happen to have that in mind. The gentleman can state that in his own speech when he comes to it. I am not talking about Arizona just at this moment. I am talking about New Mexico.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman is not in favor of ratifying the Arizona constitution and allowing that Territory to come in unless she makes a change in her constitution, notwithstanding the fact that her people have ratified it.

Mr. WILLIS. That is not the only reason. I do not think a wrong is made a right because a lot of people happen to vote for it. Does the gentleman think so?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; but I understood that was the reason the gentleman was assigning; that it was because they had ratified it by a tremendous majority.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that is not a good reason?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. MANN. Then, why does the gentleman criticize it as not being a proper reason?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Mississippi is farthest from criticizing the gentleman. The gentleman from Mississippi was simply criticizing his argument.

Mr. WILLIS. That is all received in a perfectly kindly and Christian spirit. [Laughter.]

Now, the argument I was proceeding to make, and I will continue on that line, is in reference to the constitution of New Mexico. Very distinguished and able gentlemen appeared before the committee. I have no criticism of those gentlemen. I want to say just in passing that one of the strongest arguments that I have in my mind in favor of the admission of both of these Territories is the character of the men that we had before our committee, speaking for the constitution and against the constitution. It shows that they are men of ability, men who are able to differentiate on great public questions. I am not informed as to what takes place in Democratic caucuses or Democratic conferences, if they may be so called, but I do know that the first day of this session a resolution was introduced by the distinguished chairman of this committee providing for the admission of New Mexico just as it stands, and also for the admission of Arizona, I am frank to admit.

But somehow or other our friends have seen a light. They have obtained a different idea of this thing, and this resolution that was introduced so promptly and, as I supposed as a party measure, has been modified. Why, bless you, we are more in favor of the resolution introduced by the distinguished chairman than is the chairman himself. We are in favor of what he said about New Mexico absolutely. But during the progress of the hearings various gentlemen appeared before the committee, and they brought up this question and that question, some of which have been referred to ably by my friend from Colorado, and in one way or another—I do not accuse anybody of playing politics; I do not suppose anybody ever does it——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do.

Mr. WILLIS. My friend from Michigan says that he does; perhaps he has better information. This situation which had been gone over and concurred in as being satisfactory was found to be terrible in the estimation of some people. We are told that the State is corporation ridden and that people are coming to this Congress and asking for relief.

How is this? I call attention to the fact that out of 45,000 votes there was a majority of 18,000 in favor of this constitution. I call attention to the further fact that in the canvass before the people of New Mexico the party lines were not drawn at all.

If politics is injected into this thing now it comes, I think, not from New Mexico, because the Democratic Party of New Mexico went out into the open upon the stump with the Republicans; party lines were not recognized at all, but Democrats and Republicans were all in favor of this constitution. But for some reason, political or otherwise, charges are trumped up and a fight is made on this constitution.

RECALL OF JUDGES.

Let me tell you what is the effect. I warn Members now that if they agree with me that New Mexico ought to come into the Union and come in now, you ought to vote down any amendment that is offered to the constitution that has already been made by the people of New Mexico. I will tell you why. New Mexico is almost in the Union now, because, according to the act adopted by this House, it was provided that when the President should approve this State should come in, provided Congress did not disapprove. I call attention to what the situation will be if we seek to amend the constitution. The President has approved the constitution of New Mexico, and a great many people are sorry he did not approve the constitution of Arizona. I myself believe it was a duty that the great Chief Executive owed the American people to draw the line upon the proposition and to make it clear where the American people stand—whether they want their judges independent and free to apply the law, or whether they want them to be the mere creatures of the passing gusts of public opinion. For that reason I think the action of the President is very commendable in that respect.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I will.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman wants to remove the judges from the influence of public sentiment by refusing to subject them to recall. He admits, by that, he fears their decisions would be influenced by public sentiment. He can not remove them from other influences, yet he would shield them from public sentiment that might protect the public by combating other influences to which judges are subjected.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the gentleman's speech, not mine.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I ask the gentleman if he does not admit by his position that the judges would be influenced by public opinion?

Mr. WILLIS. I think I understand the gentleman's question, and will answer it the best I can.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Having admitted that, does he fear the evil influences from the people, but have no fear of anything but good influences upon the courts from other sources?

Mr. WILLIS. I have not admitted anything. The gentleman has been doing all the talking. I will tell the gentleman what I think of that when he gets through with his question. My opinion of that is this—and it is covered, in fact, by another question which the gentleman asked about an elective judiciary. I will say that, so far as I am concerned, I am not disposed to start on any crusade on this subject. We have an elective judiciary in the great State that I have the honor in part to represent, and it is a judiciary of which we are proud.

I want to say to the gentleman that I would not be at all willing to take a step that I regard as a long way from merely electing a judge. Electing a judge for 6 years or 10 years or 4 years is quite a different proposition from having a plan whereby every decision that a judge makes renders him subject to a recall, and under the provision of this Arizona constitution 25 per cent of the electors of the district from which the judge is elected can recall him, and he then has five days in which to resign; and if he does not resign, then the election is held, and the charges against him are made in 200 words.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman surely does not mean to say that the decision of a judge will be recalled under this constitution.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, not at all. I am talking about the judge; and if the gentleman understood me to say the decision, then I was unfortunate in my language. It is the judge that I am talking about.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman believe, as I understand him to say, that it is any business whatever of the American people as to what the people of Arizona put in their constitution if that constitution gives a republican form of government? Is it a question of public policy that the people of the country or the President of the country has anything whatever to do with, if they have a constitution which gives them a republican form of government?

Mr. WILLIS. Very well, I will undertake to answer that question. The gentleman is doing what gentlemen on this side did with my friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] the other day—changing the order of his remarks somewhat—but it does not make any difference.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman that he proceed with his argument. We will not have a week's more time of debate on this bill.

POWER OF CONGRESS OVER ADMISSION OF STATES.

Mr. WILLIS. I think that suggestion is a very good one. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether anybody else will agree with this view; but since he has asked the question, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that my understanding of the power of Congress relative to the admission of States is this: From discussions that have been had it seems that some people think that the only ground upon which Congress can refuse to admit a State is the fact that its government is not republican in form. I do not mean to say that that is the gentleman's idea, but a great many people have that idea. I will say to him that my understanding of that proposition is that that is not the only ground. The Constitution of the United States says that new States may be admitted into this Union by Congress. I understand that this Congress can give any reason that it pleases. It does not need to say that its government is not republican in form. It can simply refuse for any reason or for no reason. The American Congress has absolute power. Therefore I think it is simply a question of policy. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. GRAHAM. It does; but it puts the gentleman from Ohio, as I understand him, in an inconsistent position. If I misunderstood him, I am sorry. I understood him to say that he accorded in his views with the views of the minority in their report. They put it squarely on other ground, not on the ground the gentleman from Ohio now suggests—that it should be kept out of the Union as a matter of public policy, and not because it is a republican form of government.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to say to the gentleman that I think there is no inconsistency whatever in that, and no lack of harmony with the minority of the committee. The minority of the committee did not undertake in its report to make a complete statement of the reasons, but that is given as one of the reasons. I am giving you now another reason why I think Congress has power to do that, and I will say further to the gentleman——

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman from Indiana will wait, I want to finish this subject and take one at a time, and I think they will last longer. I want to say to the gentleman that my understanding about the effect of limitations that we put upon the constitution of any State is not that which some gentlemen seem to have.

You notice the minority views say that we are in favor of the admission of Arizona provided that at the same election at which they choose their officers this question shall be voted on and the recall stricken out. I am perfectly frank to say to the gentleman if the people of Arizona want to do it hereafter, they can put their recall back into their constitution. I will say to him that any compact that is made between this Government and a Territory becomes practically of no force the moment the Territory is admitted, except in two particulars, and those are, first, if it be something that is within the power of Congress under the Federal Constitution, and then it is not because of the compact, but because of the constitutional power; and, secondly, if it is something related to property.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman think they would have the right to put into their constitution a provision that judges should be elected for only a term of one year, and would it then meet his approval——

Mr. WILLIS. I do——

Mr. GRAHAM. What, then, would be the difference between the present provision and that one? Practically it would take a year to oust a judge now——

Mr. WILLIS. I have already stated my understanding of that matter. I think that there is a vast difference, sir, between the election of a judge for a certain definite term and the election of that judge with the understanding——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I suggest the gentleman have some time to use of his own.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield the gentleman 30 minutes additional.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; but I would like to be allowed to proceed for a few minutes, as I want to get——

Mr. CULLOP. Just a moment ago the gentleman paid a high tribute to the judiciary of Ohio. Is that correct?

Mr. WILLIS. I did not get the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CULLOP. In the gentleman's remarks a few moments ago he paid a high tribute to the judiciary of Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know whether I did or not, but I am willing to do so so far as I have the ability to do it.

Mr. CULLOP. Have not you had the removal in your constitution of judges in Ohio since 1851?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, it has not been abused there, has it?

Mr. WILLIS. No.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, the difference between that and this is the difference of the application of the law that has been in the constitution in every State in the Union as long as they have been States. Now, in your State a judge can be removed on complaint of one person, can he not?

Mr. WILLIS. Now, if the gentleman wants to make a speech I will be glad if he will get some time to do so——

Mr. CULLOP. I am simply asking a question.

Mr. WILLIS. Because I like to get on. However, I want to say to the gentleman I think there is a very distinct difference between the recall of a judge and election of a judge for a definite term with the power vested in the legislature to impeach that judge or remove him from office. There is a very distinct difference between that process wherein a judge is to have notice of the charges against him, is to have opportunity to appear by counsel, to have a dignified trial in the name of the great State of Ohio; as I say, there is a distinct difference between that and the proposition submitting that judge to a recall. [Applause.] Now, if the gentleman wants to make a speech I wish he would get some time, as I wish to proceed with what I have to say and I do not wish to be cut out of so much of my time.

Mr. CULLOP. Just one more question.

Mr. WILLIS. Go on.

Mr. CULLOP. In the constitution of your State, paragraph 17 of the judiciary article provides for the removal or recall of judges.

Mr. WILLIS. I am familiar with that.

Mr. CULLOP. There the judge can be removed upon the application of one person.

Mr. WILLIS. But on a two-thirds vote of the legislature. I want to say to the gentleman there is a big difference between two-thirds of the legislature and——

Mr. CULLOP. In one case you go to a partisan legislature to be tried by a partisan tribunal instead of going to the whole people where your case can be passed upon without prejudice or partiality.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman wants to make a speech on that side, I would be glad to have him do so, but I have made my position clear. I want to see to some of the things taken up by my friend from Colorado in his remarks. A great deal of discussion has been had here and elsewhere about this method of amendment. It is said that it is necessary that the constitution of New Mexico shall be very seriously and vitally changed because of the method of amendment which is provided.

AMENDMENT OF NEW MEXICO'S CONSTITUTION.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have given a little study to this subject. I have here the constitutions of all the States of the Union. I do not pretend to say that I know about all the constitutions of the various States in the Union, not at all, but I have given the subject of the method of amendment such attention as I have been able to do. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that not only is the constitution of New Mexico not the most difficult one to amend, but I want to say that it is one of the easiest constitutions to amend anywhere in the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. WILLIS. I will.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has heard the proponents of the New Mexico constitution say that they sought to render it difficult of amendment, did he not?

Mr. WILLIS. I believe they said that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then, according to the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio, they fell down lamentably in their purpose, did they not?

Mr. WILLIS. I am not saying anything about what anyone from New Mexico said. I am talking about this constitution as it is.

Now, I am going to call attention to that somewhat in detail. I do not know whether Members have the constitution on their desks. If they have, and if they will turn to Article XIX, they will find this amendment:

> Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature in any session thereof, and if two-thirds of all the members elected to each of the two houses, voting separately, shall vote in favor of it, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on the respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon.

In other words, amendments can be proposed by a two-thirds vote of the legislature.

Now, going on:

> Or any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed at the first regular session of the legislature held after the expiration of two years from the time this constitution goes into effect, or at the regular session of the legislature convening each eighth year thereafter.

In other words, then, what are the methods of proposing amendments? They can be proposed either by two-thirds vote of the legislature, and the first legislature that meets after New Mexico shall have been admitted can propose amendments by a majority vote, and the legislature every eighth year thereafter can propose amendments by a majority vote. That is the way now that amendments are proposed.

Now, I have taken some pains to investigate how amendments are proposed in the constitutions in the States as they exist now. We gathered from the remarks of my friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], and from discussion before the committee, that it is very difficult to propose amendments in New Mexico as compared with other States in the Union. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that there are only two States in the Union—just two—that allow a majority of the legislature, in one session, to propose an amendment, and a majority vote of the people voting thereon to ratify the amendment. Those two States are Missouri and South Dakota. With great respect to the distinguished Member from the State of Missouri, who is a member of this Committee, I want to say that it seems to me that it is bad policy, whether in the constitution of his or any other State, to allow the majority of the legislature to propose amendments to the constitution and then a majority of those voting thereon to ratify them. I call attention to the fact that that is exactly what is proposed in this amendment that is offered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Can the gentleman cite from any knowledge of the operation of that provision in the constitution of Missouri that it is a bad thing?

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir; I have no personal knowledge of it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say that I have been familiar with that provision since it was written into the constitution in 1875, and I wish to say to the gentleman that it has never worked badly. It has proved desirable.

Mr. WILLIS. I am glad to hear that, and I want to say further that I think that is because of the good sense of the people of Missouri and not because of the constitution. They have gotten along well, not because of the provision in the constitution but in spite of it.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman know that because the people of Missouri have such good sense, New Mexico, having been peopled largely by Missourians, that the people of New Mexico exhibit the same good sense, and do you not think they are worthy of emulation?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; and I think the provision whereby a majority of the people who have been elected to the legislature can propose an amendment every eight years is ample.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that it is a proof of good sense that they moved out of Missouri into New Mexico?

Mr. WILLIS. I repeat that there are only two States in this Union that allow their constitutions to be amended in that way, and I repeat, with the greatest deference to the opinions of gentlemen on the other side, if you are going to have a constitution in which the legislature can amend the constitution at any time, very well and good, but that is not our American system.

I have always supposed that the object of a written constitution was to give some degree of stability in government, and if you allow a majority of the members elected to the legislature to propose amendments and then a majority of those voting thereon to ratify the amendments, you put it within the power of a very small minority to change your fundamental law.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I yield with pleasure. It will give me a chance to take a sip of water. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the constitution of New Mexico provide, as it is now written, that the whole of it may be adopted by the majority vote of the people of that Territory?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. Very well.

Mr. FOWLER. Then what is the difference between amending it by a majority vote and adopting it by a majority vote?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman that there is a good deal of difference between the adoption of a constitution in the first place and its amendment—a constitution that has been gone over carefully in a constitutional convention, as has been done in the case of New Mexico, where the people have been working on it for 60 years, and where, but for such trifling objections as are being made here to-day, that Territory would now be in the Union and would have been in the Union 25 years ago. This is simply a continuance of the old political game of holding it up. When the people have considered the subject, as they have in this case, for 50 or 60 years, and it has been before two or three Congresses, I say to my friend from Illinois that there is quite a distinct difference between the adoption of that and the offering of amendments to the constitution.

Now, I want to proceed in regard to this method of amendment: First, it is provided that by a two-thirds vote of the legislature at any time amendments may be proposed; and, second, by a majority vote every eight years. I have already called attention to the fact that there are only two States in the Union that allow their constitutions to be amended in that way.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think the gentleman will find that that is a mistake. The State of Virginia provides in its constitution for the amendment of the constitution by a majority vote, and I think, therefore, you should add Virginia to the others.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well. That may be true; but I want to see about this. In Virginia, as you will find in the seventh volume of American Charters and Constitutions, page 3955, it is provided that the amendment shall be proposed by a majority elected to each house, referred to the next assembly to be chosen, and if agreed to by the majority elected to that house, then it is to be submitted to a vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Where is the two-thirds proposition in there, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman was talking about the majority proposition.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There it is—a majority of the members elected to each house.

Mr. WILLIS. The point I make is this, that in the gentleman's State of Virginia the amendment has to be passed upon by two succeeding legislatures. But according to the constitution of New Mexico that is not provided for, and the constitution of New Mexico is therefore more easily amended than that of Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that that was not the distinction which the gentleman started out to make.

Mr. MANN. It was the precise distinction.

Mr. WILLIS. I said there are only two States, and the gentleman's State can not be added to that number, because in that State, if I read the constitution of Virginia correctly—and I would be glad to be corrected if I am mistaken—the amendment must be referred to two succeeding legislatures, and that is a very different thing. Therefore the statement I have made is absolutely correct, so far as that is concerned, that there are only two States in the Union where that applies, the States of Missouri and South Dakota. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, let us see about the other States. From the tremendous outbursts of eloquence from my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN]—and nobody knows better than he how to let those outbursts out, and also how, in the interest of party harmony, to quell his wrath and swallow his indignity and let it all go, as he did yesterday, when he had a good case that I hoped he would fight to the bitter end [applause and laughter]—I say, to hear my eloquent friend from Colorado you would suppose that this was an unusual thing, this provision that two-thirds of the legislature, as in the case of New Mexico, should be required to pass upon an amendment, and——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman pardon me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I said that I found no particular quarrel with that proposition. I yielded my judgment on that point. I said I would be satisfied to leave the precedent as to submitting amendments just as it stands now. But I am interested in that 40 per cent proposition in at least one-half of the counties.

Mr. WILLIS. I recognize that the gentleman yielded his judgment. That is the quarrel I have with him. He yielded it yesterday when he was right. He yields his judgment when he is right and he stands up for it when he is wrong. [Laughter and applause.] Now, then, a three-fifths vote or a two-thirds vote of the legislature is required to propose an amendment to the constitutions of the following States: Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, and so on; I will not read them all. I believe there are 27 or 28 of them in all. More than a majority of all the States of this great Union have similar provisions requiring three-fifths or two thirds of the legislature to propose an amendment to the constitution.

But that is not all. The half has not been told. In at least 14 or 15 States of this Union action is required in some form, not by one legislature, as is provided in the constitution of New Mexico, but in two succeeding legislatures. The States so requiring action in two succeeding legislatures in order to get an amendment proposed to the constitution are Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, South Carolina, Iowa, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Nevada, and North Dakota, some 14 in all, in which action is required by two succeeding legislatures. There is no such provision as that in the constitution of New Mexico.

I submit, gentlemen, in view of these facts, is it not true that it is as easy to propose an amendment under the constitution of New Mexico as it is in the country at large, when, as I say, we have 27 or 28 that require the same vote and 14 or 15 that require a heavier vote, in that they require action in two succeeding sessions of the general assembly?

Now, there is another point I want to bring up before I forget it. Some one asked a question the other day which the gentleman from Colorado would have been able to answer if he had had a little more time, but he was tremendously crowded by questions, and so this escaped his attention. Some one—I think it was the gentleman from Illinois—asked him about the limitation as to the number of amendments, whether there were any States that had provisions in their constitutions limiting the number of amendments. I have taken pains to dig that out. The committee proposes to strike out the clause that says that not more than three amendments shall be proposed at once. I have taken pains to inquire how many States in this Union require a limitation as to the number of amendments. There are seven States of this Union that have limitations in the constitution as to the number of amendments—Arkansas, not more than three at one time; Colorado, not more than one at each session of the legislature——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. We can amend six articles now at one time. We have modified that provision in the constitution.

Mr. WILLIS. I am glad to have that correction made. It does not appear in the Constitutions and Charters. Kentucky not more than two at one session; Montana, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Vermont. There are seven, in all, having this very provision. Some of them have it in more stringent form, but the point I am making is that it is not anything new or unusual to have a limitation as to the number of amendments that shall be offered.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has found that in 39 States out of 46 there are no limitations as to the number of amendments that may be submitted at one time.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not made the subtraction, but I have no doubt the gentleman is correct. The point I am making is to counteract the proposition that this is something new and strange and will overthrow the liberties of the people. Why, gentlemen, in Arkansas the liberties of the people are protected. In Colorado, sun kissed, with her peaks rising into the skies and the snows resting everlasting thereon, the rights of the people are protected there. [Applause.] And so in Kentucky, the great State where the farmers have the "emptiness of ages in their countenance" and the "burdens of the world upon their back," why, in Kentucky the rights of the people are generally protected. The point I am seeking to make with my friend from Colorado is that this is not anything unusual—this is not anything dangerous at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the only point I was seeking to make was to argue the reasonableness of the recommendation of the majority of the committee, and I think I am fully sustained by the fact that in 39 of the 46 States in the Union there is no limitation in the constitution as to the number of amendments that may be submitted and acted upon at one time. I think the gentleman will concede that.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not make the subtraction. It is a matter of arithmetic. Well, then, what is good sauce for the gander is good sauce for the goose. If the gentleman argues that because there are 36 or 37 States that do not have limitations, then when I show him that there are 28 that require a two-thirds vote to propose amendments he is bound to accept that by the same logic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not want any erroneous statement of mine to stand in the RECORD. We were furnished with a table by the clerk of the committee over there, and my understanding of that table is that in 28 of the 46 States of the Union a majority of the people can ratify an amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I am not talking about the ratification of amendments at all. I have been talking about the proposal of amendments.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that he certainly is mistaken when he makes the statement that there are only two States in the Union that permit the submission of amendments by a majority of the legislature, for an investigation will show that 18 States of the Union allow an amendment to be submitted by a majority of the legislature, 7 States by a three-fifths vote, and 21 States by two-thirds.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, if the gentleman will do me the favor, I desire to state that there are two States now where a majority of the legislature can propose the amendment, and a majority of the people voting thereon can ratify it.

Mr. KENDALL. At one session of the legislature?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. I shall be obliged to the gentleman if he will name me one other State. I have the constitutions right here.

Mr. MANN. Name it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Well, Nevada.

Mr. WILLIS. We will look for that. If I am wrong I shall be glad to make the correction, because I want to get this thing right. Nevada we will find in volume 4, page 2423. Nevada—proposed by a majority of the members elected to each house, submitted to the legislature next elected thereafter, and then adopted by the people—just exactly what I said. [Applause on the Republican side.] Name another one.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It takes a majority——

Mr. WILLIS. In two successive legislatures, just exactly as I said.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. A majority of the legislature and a majority of the people can put an amendment in the constitution.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Of two legislatures.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Two legislatures; but still it is a majority of the legislature. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIS. I submit to the House that I made that statement as clear as I could, and I walked clear down to my friend the chairman of the committee so as to make it clear. My statement is that there are only two States that allow a majority of the legislature, and then my friend from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] put in that it was at one session of the legislature, and I accepted that, to submit to a majority of the people to ratify. Now, name another State.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Why, there are a great number of States.

Mr. WILLIS. Name just one of them.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Try Michigan.

Mr. WILLIS. Got her! [Laughter.] We might as well have information on this subject. Michigan you will find in Volume IV, page 1969, American Charters and Constitutions, and the gentleman can look at the volume, if he wishes—proposed by two-thirds of the members elected to each house, submitted to a general election, and adopted by a majority—bearing out my statement exactly. A majority of the legislature can not propose. Name another.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Why, the gentleman is mistaken about Michigan.

Mr. WILLIS. I am not.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have not got the book here.

Mr. WILLIS. But I have. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman's books are like his facts as to Colorado. He stated that Colorado could submit but one amendment by a legislature, and it turns out that it can submit amendments to six articles of its constitution. His books are antiquated, like the gentleman's information is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I leave my good friend, the chairman of the committee, to settle his dispute with this authority. I can not go and write a book, though I am here for the purpose of instructing him. I have too limited a time to write a book for that purpose, but I take this out of American Charters, Constitutions, and Organic Laws.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But the gentleman has just failed to make his investigation go far enough. I will have time later on and show that the gentleman is entirely mistaken in his statement. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I have not any objection at all to having the gentleman show us those things. I am enjoying this. See the State of Michigan, page 1916, volume 4:

Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives if the same shall be agreed to by two-thirds of the members.

Now, that is right; there is no doubt about it; and I shall be glad to have the gentleman name another case. I want to get at the truth of this matter.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will bring the gentleman the books and authorities——

Mr. WILLIS. When the gentleman comes to make his speech I will see to it that he has the books and authorities; I will caution him on that point.

Mr. MANN. He will never bring them.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not think he will.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Before this question goes further——

Mr. WILLIS. I do not want to be driven too far afield, but go on.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Leaving Colorado out of the seven States that have a limitation, Colorado's limitation being six articles, I want to ask the gentleman if he can just tell me offhand whether or not in those other six States the limitation is as to the number of articles that may be amended or as to the number of amendments that may be submitted, because I want to say to him I object to the use of the word "amendments" in the New Mexico constitution even more than to the other limitation as to the number—three.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman, so far as my investigation went on that line, that I think in all this the limitation was as to the number of amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And not articles.

Mr. WILLIS. So far as my investigation has gone.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I consider the use of the word "amendments" much more objectionable than I do the limitation "three."

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman first allow me one question; does the Colorado constitution provide that the amendments may be submitted to six articles at one time?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman hear his colleague from Colorado state that the Colorado constitution was originally based upon the Illinois constitution which originally provided for amendment to only one article? That is the present Illinois constitution.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To one article.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield 30 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If the gentleman will just pardon me here. We added a new article to our constitution and we have had one of the greatest legal battles in that State upon the ground that that one article amended more than six articles, the number now permitted. Now, New Mexico will be up against the same proposition in much worse form. They can only submit three amendments, and it might be claimed that the number was exhausted in amending one section of one article in three particulars. That is the reason the committee has not seen fit to adopt this limitation. The idea is that it is more or less a joker in the constitution.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman absolutely confuses the proposition.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman which two States he named as the States where the constitution provided an amendment could be submitted on a majority vote of the legislature?

Mr. WILLIS. Majority vote of the legislature and ratified by a majority voting thereon. Just one legislature; not two succeeding ones. The two States are Missouri and South Dakota, as I recall it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Missouri and South Dakota?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I do.

Mr. KENDALL. And in all other States of the Union except Missouri and South Dakota an amendment must be proposed by a majority, or two-thirds or three-fifths, in two succeeding general assemblies.

Mr. WILLIS. There are some 27 or 28 that require an amendment to be proposed by a two-thirds vote and some 14 that require two succeeding legislatures. The point that I am seeking to make is that the amending of the constitution of New Mexico is not unusual, is not more difficult than it is in any other State of the Union, and it certainly is not unrepublican or undemocratic or un-American. But my friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] raises some question about another point here, and that is one about which a great deal of discussion has been raised, and that is the provision as to ratification. It is said here:

> If the same be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon and by an affirmative vote equal to at least 40 per cent of all the votes cast at said election in the State and in at least one-half of the counties thereof.

Now, that is the point to which the most serious objection has been raised. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in discussing that feature, that it seems to me that absolutely the best authority and the best precedent for that proposition is the method of amending the Constitution of the United States. That is well understood. Amendments must be ratified by three-fourths of the State legislatures or by convention in three-fourths of the States, as one method or the other shall be provided by Congress. In other words, it was believed to be a necessary and proper limitation in the making of amendments to the Federal Constitution that not mere numbers shall count, but that the people living in certain, definite, distinct political units, in separate and distinct jurisdictions, should be recognized as such, and therefore the requirement that amendments should be ratified by three-fourths of the States.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish to ask whether the gentleman has found in the constitution of any other State in the Union a provision requiring a certain percentage of the votes cast in at least half of the counties in the State as necessary to ratify amendments?

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman repeat his question? I was interrupted.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will ask the gentleman if he found in the constitution of any other State in the Union a requirement for a certain percentage of the votes in at least one-half of the counties in the State for the ratification of the constitution?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I did not.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman learned in the committee that New Mexico is to be equally divided between Americans and Mexicans; that the Americans control some counties and the Mexicans control some counties; and does not the gentleman know that that identical proposition was put into that constitution to hog-tie it, because of the almost absolute certainty of the differences that would arise between the American and Mexican people of that Territory over amendments to the constitution?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know that, and I do not think the gentleman knows that. I do know this, however, that that provision was put into the constitution of New Mexico, in part, to do what he says, namely, to guarantee that there should never be a time in the history of that State when the incoming population should be able absolutely to control and to destroy the rights and privileges of the original people of New Mexico. That was one idea. As he correctly states, there are some counties——

Mr. POWERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WILLIS. I do.

Mr. POWERS. I just wanted to make this suggestion, that the majority of the Territorial Committee, in the joint resolution which they have proposed, embodies the same objection which the gentleman from Colorado raises to the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio. In other words, they say in this resolution:

> Provided, That no amendment shall apply to or affect the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of article 7 hereof, on elective franchise, and sections 8 and 10 of article 12 hereof, on education, unless it be proposed by vote——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, the gentleman has proceeded far enough, so that I can answer——

Mr. POWERS (continuing)—

> unless it be proposed by vote of three-fourths of the members elected to each house and be ratified by a vote of the people of this State in an election at which at least three-fourths of the electors voting in the whole State and at least two-thirds of those voting in each county in the State shall vote for such amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that I will respond to that briefly, and if the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] wishes to take it up later he can do so in his own time. I will state in fairness to the committee, with the majority of which I disagree absolutely on this proposition, that they made a fair effort, in the clause which the gentleman has just read, to carry out the provision of the enabling act and the constitution, so far as it exists here in regard to education and the elective franchise.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And a majority of the people of New Mexico, regardless of politics, want that provision of the constitution to remain just as it is.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman can explain that in his own time.

It is provided here that there must be at least 40 per cent of the total votes, and a majority of those voting thereon. Now, I wonder if there is anything unfair about that? Is it the idea that constitutions can be so easily amended that a few people can run together somewhere on a rainy election day and change the fundamental law of the State? Is that the idea? I am informed by a credible authority, namely, Stimson on Constitutions, that there is a case in one great State of this Union—and it is a State, by the way, which allows the amendments to be ratified by a majority of those voting thereon—in one great State of this Union less than one-fifth of the qualified electors absolutely changed the fundamental law of the State. Half of the people did not go to the election.

Gentlemen, I say to you that that is not a safe provision; it is not a wise provision to allow a small minority to change the fundamental law.

Now, then, this is an attempt—I think an honest attempt—to meet that difficulty; and, as the gentleman from Colorado suggested, the 40 per cent clause is intended to protect absolutely the different nationalties and different classes of people who live in this great Territory of New Mexico.

Now, then, the provision as to the number of amendments I have already discussed. There are some seven States that have limitations as to the number of amendments. That is all I care to say, I think, on the subject of amendments, except to summarize it in this way: Taking it both ways, taking the method of proposing amendments and the method of ratifying amendments, consider them both together, and you will find that the people of New Mexico have provided a fair and reasonable and honest method of amending their constitution. And I want to say to you that, judging from the character of men who have come before this committee, both in favor of the constitution and against it, if experience shows that there is anything in this constitution that ought not to be there, there is enough virility and enough intellectual power and enough political independence in the Territory of New Mexico to amend its constitution whenever it ought to be amended under the present provisions pertaining to amendments. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, it is said——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The President of the United States and other parties who, it is said, have criticized parts of the Arizona constitution or the proposed constitution, have been severely criticized in turn by persons here on the floor after it had received an overwhelming majority of the votes of that Territory. I would like to know if the gentleman has made any inquiry as to what the majority was, as expressed by the people in New Mexico, for the proposed New Mexico constitution?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I have been over that before.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I was not in at the time.

Mr. WILLIS. As I recall the figures, in a vote of 45,000 there was 18,000 majority for it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And how much in Arizona?

Mr. WILLIS. I told the gentleman before that I had not investigated that. When the gentleman from Mississippi comes to make his speech he can put that in, and I have no doubt he will make a good speech, although it will be faulty in logic.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not object to my putting it in here?

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman can put it in when he makes his speech, but not while I am making my speech.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The gentleman stated that there were only two States in the Union in which a majority of the general assembly could submit an amendment and that amendment be voted on by the people. I stated to the gentleman that I thought he was mistaken, that he was reading from antiquated books, and as soon as I could get up-to-date books I would show that he was mistaken. Now I have here the constitution of the State of Oklahoma, and it reads this way:

Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either branch of the legislature, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses such proposed amendment or amendments shall, with the yeas and nays thereon, be entered in their journals, and referred by the secretary of state to the people for their approval or rejection at the next regular general election—

Mr. WILLIS. Read on.

Mr. MANN. Read the balance of it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will read the balance.

except when the legislature, by two-thirds vote of each house, shall order a special election for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIS. That is sufficient; I am satisfied; let that go in the RECORD.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will leave it to the committee to say whether the gentleman from Ohio is mistaken.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, I will leave it to the House. I am very much obliged to the distinguished chairman for substantiating what I said. I said, and have said repeatedly, that there are only two States where a majority of the legislature could propose an amendment and a majority vote thereon could ratify it. I have said that half a dozen times. Now, then, what the gentleman read proved that exactly. The last clause said that if a majority of all the electors voting at such election—not voting thereon—and the gentleman will have to get another book.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That refers to a special election held for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIS. I am satisfied to let that go in the RECORD. The more authorities the gentleman brings in the better it is. Bring in some more books; it proves exactly what I said.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. If it is at a general election, it takes a majority of the people voting thereon.

Mr. WILLIS. But if the gentleman will permit me to suggest, the provision requires that a special election is to be called by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But the gentleman said there was no State in this Union except two at which a majority of the legislature could submit an amendment and a majority voting on it could adopt it. Here is a third. I will get more books and show the gentleman that he is wrong.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to let it go in the RECORD, and I want to read this provision in my own time and let the country judge who is right in this matter. The constitution of Oklahoma, article 24, section 1, provides:

Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either branch of the legislature, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall, with the yeas and nays thereon, be entered in their journals and referred by the secretary of state to the people for their approval or rejection at the next regular general election, except when the legislature by a two-thirds vote—

That carries out the proposition I laid down precisely, that a majority can not do it—except when the legislature by a two-thirds vote of each house shall order a special election for that purpose.

Then it goes on to say that if a majority of all the electors vote at such election—not a majority voting thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Who else would be voting at a special election on a constitutional matter?

Mr. WILLIS. At a special election two-thirds of the legislature has acted. That proves what I said and disproves absolutely what the gentleman from Virginia said.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not agree with the gentleman. The constitution of Arizona has simply provided for a special election on amendments.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have to differ with the gentleman's construction of this language.

Mr. WILLIS. I can not help that. If the gentleman wants to differ with a fact——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am not differing about the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIS. The constitution says that a majority may submit, and a majority voting thereon may adopt, if at a general election, but if they want a special election, it takes two-thirds to submit.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. My friend is just mistaken. But we will thrash that out in my time.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I have read this into the RECORD, and I should be glad when the gentleman makes his speech, and I know it will be an able and eloquent one, to have him cite the appropriate page of the RECORD and point out the matter in regard to which I am mistaken. I challenge him and the gentleman from Colorado now to do that, and on that occasion I will be here with the books. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It looks as though we might thrash this matter out now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I will make one more statement, and then I am going to leave this proposition.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Oh, let us thrash it out now.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. It has been thrashed out.

Mr. WILLIS. It has been thrashed out. There are none so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me make one more statement and I will yield to the gentleman for a question. I stated distinctly that there are only two States where a majority of the legislature could propose an amendment——

Mr. WEDEMEYER. At one session.

Mr. WILLIS. At one session, and a majority of those voting thereon could ratify it, and I stated that so many times that I know the House is tired of it. The gentleman brings up Oklahoma as a supposed exception to that rule, and by what he himself read, and by what will appear in the RECORD, he states that a majority can propose, but it shall be ratified by a majority of those voting at that election.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I am going to say that—just be calm. But I will allow the gentleman to say his after a time. I want to say mine now. [Laughter.] I decline to yield for the present. I said then that a majority could not propose an amendment. Now, then, in what the gentleman has read he himself has shown as clearly as the English language will permit of it that you can not have a special election except by a two-thirds vote of the legislature, and therefore a majority could not get an amendment so proposed that a majority voting thereon could ratify. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, to make this matter clear, the gentleman has stated his position, and that position was that there was no State in the Union, excepting these two, a majority of the members of both houses of the legislature of which at one legislature could submit amendments and a majority of the people could adopt them.

Mr. MANN. That is not what he said.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. A majority at one session of the legislature.

Mr. MANN. That is not what he said.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; it was. The gentleman stated this, that there were only two States in the Union in which a majority of the legislature could at one session submit amendments to the people and have those amendments ratified by a majority of the people.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is not what the gentleman said.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Voting on the amendment, a majority of the people voting on the amendment. Now, here is the constitution of Oklahoma——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Voting at that election.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The constitution of Oklahoma, which provides that a majority of the members of both houses of the Oklahoma Legislature can submit an amendment at a general election, and at that general election it only takes a majority voting upon the amendment to adopt it.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Voting in that election.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is not what it says.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read your book.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have read it. It takes two-thirds of the legislature to submit amendments to a special election, and those amendments—those submitted at a special election—must be ratified by a majority of the electors voting at that election, but amendments submitted at general election are ratified by a majority; but if the legislature, by a majority vote of both houses, submits an amendment to the people of Oklahoma at a general election, a majority of the voters voting upon the amendment at their general election adopts the amendment, and that is in direct contradiction of the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I have given the gentleman time to make a statement, and now I am going to make one more statement about that and then leave it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need to do so; everybody else understands it.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, the gentleman himself will understand it when he reads this over himself and studies it a little bit.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will not see any such thing, because I have read it.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I desire to say to the gentleman we have been over that ground in Oklahoma. I do not want to say definitely right now, but my recollection is that a majority of the people voted for the proposed amendment who voted on it at the general election, but a majority of the votes cast in the State at that general election did not favor the proposed amendment, and it failed.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is the distinction; that is the exact distinction.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Now, I am not quite certain I am right, but that is correct, so my colleague [Mr. CARTER] says.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The constitution says that.

APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am told by the gentleman who has charge of the time on this side that I must hurry, and I think that is wise, and I will be much obliged if I shall be allowed to proceed very briefly now. There is another thing about which considerable controversy has arisen, and that is the method of apportionment. A great deal of discussion was had before the committee, and before we get through here you are going to hear a great deal about the method of apportionment. It will be claimed that it is absolutely and unqualifiedly unfair, and all that sort of thing. Now, I have not the time, nor has the House the inclination, I am sure, to go into that with a great deal of detail. I have taken the pains to take up these different districts which are outlined here in the constitution of New Mexico, at page 10 in this copy I have, and then the senatorial districts, and I have taken the vote for Delegates in Congress the last time an election was had, and I have gone over those districts very carefully, and I find—and I have the figures before me—that among those districts—24 in all—there are 11 that will be Democratic and there are 13 that will be Republican. Now, I submit as a fair proposition, gentlemen, it will be pretty difficult to make a much more equitable distribution than that. We are men here, all of us, who know somewhat about how those things go in politics, and there is no use of men on one side or the other arrogating to themselves any special credit or virtue about this. To be perfectly frank, this constitutional convention of New Mexico was Republican.

And I sincerely hope that every legislative body that shall meet in that State or Territory for a long while will continue to be Republican. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I want to say that, measuring these things from a party standpoint, I believe that this apportionment was unusually fair. As I say, I have the figures, but I shall not take time to quote them, but if anyone desires to see them, I will make out a table and put it in the RECORD. Thirteen of those districts will be Republican and 11 of them will be Democratic on the basis of the votes cast for Delegate in Congress at the last election. If the Members will turn to the report of the majority of the committee——

Mr. POWERS. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any Democratic congressional district in that State as now apportioned by the new constitution, or otherwise, which will contain twice as large a population as any Republican district, following the principle as laid down in Kentucky, where one Republican district contains more population than two Democratic districts?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman that not only is that not so, but the districts are almost exactly equal in population. There will not be in the State of New Mexico any such outrage as was shown by the gentleman from Kentucky here on the floor of this House a few days ago in the apportionment of districts and counties in his State, and when the gentleman from Kentucky offered an amendment to provide that there should not be more than 75,000 difference in the districts, gentlemen on that side——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. What I started to say, Mr. Chairman, was that under this constitution as it stands there can not be any such outrage as the gentleman called attention to when he offered the amendment to provide that these congressional districts should not have a difference of more than 75,000 in population, and gentlemen on that side voted the amendment down. And then he offered one at 50,000 and one at 20,000, and those were voted down by gentlemen that are the very personification of fairness and are objecting to this constitution as unfair. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. I understand you to say that you consider the constitution of New Mexico republican in form?

Mr. WILLIS. I had not said that, but that is a very eloquent thing to say. I will say it for the sake of argument; yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Then the constitution of Arizona, where it provides for the referendum, is republican in form?

Mr. WILLIS. Probably so. I have said to the gentleman just as clearly as I could that I was not here raising any objection to that. I will vote to admit Arizona with the exception of the recall of judges.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. WILLIS. I will, inasmuch as he is over on our side. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I wanted to ask the gentleman when he was elaborating his argument relative to the proportionate counties that would have to vote in favor of an amendment, that I understood him to say that that was proposed in order that old citizens might be protected against the new citizens?

Mr. WILLIS. Both ways, I think, my friend. You see, there are——

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I will ask you another question: What do you mean by protecting the old citizens against the new citizens?

Mr. WILLIS. That is a very fair question, and I think it is asked in perfect good faith. I am glad for the interruption. The proposition is just this, and I am glad that my attention has been called to that feature of it. The gentleman must understand that in this Territory of New Mexico there are two great classes of people. There are the old New Mexicans, who have lived there for two or three hundred years, perhaps not so long as that, but they have lived there for a century or so, but in certain counties there are people who have come in from other States, from the great State of Texas, for example, from the State of Colorado, and other States.

The gentleman can readily understand that there is somewhat of friction between those two classes. For instance, the main population there have a certain system of irrigation law; for example, a certain system as to the descent of property and other things of that kind quite different from that offered by the new population coming from other States. The point is to protect, as far as possible, those people, and I think that was put in the constitution in a perfectly fair way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention very briefly again to what is said here about these counties. It is stated in the report, on page 3, that the four counties of Colfax, San Miguel, Bernalillo, and Socorro have an aggregate population of 77,000, the idea being that being put there they will be able to control the legislature and prevent the submission of amendments.

Well, now, that can not possibly be. There is no party advantage in that. For example, the county of Colfax is Democratic by 52. The county of Bernalillo is Republican, I am glad to say. Socorro is a county concerning which a great deal of argument has been made. It is said that Socorro County has been yoked up with other counties in order that it may be able to control them. The majority in Socorro County is only 143. The fact is, without going into detail in this matter, that the apportionment provided for in this constitution is fair. It protects all sections and all interests and all classes, and was intended so to do.

Now I pass to another division of the subject. It is said that——

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. I just want to know on what vote the gentleman based his statement of the majorities.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman was not present when I mentioned this before, I am sure. I made my computations on the vote at the last election for Delegate.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the evidence before the committee on that?

Mr. WILLIS. I am familiar with that. I thought the fairest way to all the counties would be to take the last vote on national questions, when the division indicated by the vote was a division on party lines.

Mr. BOOHER. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that all the witnesses before the committee agreed that it was more of a personal contest than a political contest. And was it not agreed by all parties that the fair way would be to take the votes of each county on some county officer, where the standing of the candidates was about equal? I will ask the gentleman from Ohio whether everybody before the committee did not agree that the Territory was Republican by 5,000?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; they said it was Republican, and I am extremely glad they did.

Now, I will state to the gentleman, in further reply to his question, that I took that method of computation because it seemed that there was absolutely no other way to get at it. The gentleman from Missouri and myself and other people in this House know nothing about the probate clerk or the county clerk. Nobody knows anything about that. When a man is voting for county officers the personal element enters more largely into the election than it does when he votes for Delegates to Congress. I took that vote because it was the only one obtainable. I think that is perfectly fair.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman admit that it was agreed before the committee, when the Delegate was present from that Territory, that the majority, as figured out, was a majority of about 5,000 Republican?

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that general remarks to that effect were made. I took as my authority the Blue Book of the Territory of New Mexico. If the gentleman from Missouri has any other authority, or better authority, I would be glad to have him call it up.

Mr. BOOHER. The Delegate was elected by something like three or four hundred majority.

Mr. WILLIS. Three hundred and eighty-eight.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to be absolutely fair. Every witness before the committee, when we came to the discussion of that part of the proposition, said it would not be fair to take that vote as showing the political complexion of the Territory, because of the personal character of the contest. It was a personal contest and not a political one.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no way of getting at any better figures.

CONTROL OF CORPORATIONS.

But I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that another charge here is that this constitution was dictated by the corporations; that this is a tremendously corporation-ridden State, and all that sort of thing; and that the people must be protected against the unholy conspiracies of these corporations. Now, if that charge is true, it ought to be investigated, and investigated very carefully. But I want to call the attention of gentlemen to a few provisions of this constitution which were certainly not written in there by these corporations that were supposed to control. For example, I have before me section 12, on page 20, which provides—

> Lands held in large tracts shall not be assessed for taxation at any lower value per acre than lands of the same character or quality and similarly situated held in smaller tracts.

Did some corporation lawyer write that into the constitution? Then, take the provision in relation to the corporation commission. Three men are to be elected in the State, elected by a vote of the people, and these three men are to have charge of the organization of corporations, the regulation of railroad rates, and things of that sort.

It is provided—and I speak very hastily upon this point—it is provided that whenever a case is taken up by that corporation commission, whenever an order is issued to a railroad company as to a rate, if that order is not obeyed immediately, instead of the litigant having to go to tremendous trouble and expense to carry his case before the supreme court, it acts automatically. The case is transferred to the supreme court. Now, I am frank to say, so far as my observation has gone, there is not any such provision as that in any constitution of any other State in this Union. This is an attempt, and I believe an attempt in good faith, to make it impossible to have the kind of litigation that this country has witnessed so much in the past 10 years. There comes in some administrative body, a corporation commission, an Interstate Commerce Commission, or something of that kind, and issues an order. Then the difficulty has been that a restraining order will issue from a court and the whole thing be tied up. What is the object of this provision? To make it so far as possible self-executing, so that the case is carried immediately to the supreme court of the State; and this corporation commission is charged with the duty of protecting the rights and the interests of the people. It is charged with the duty of carrying cases, if necessary, before the Commerce Court. My personal opinion is that it is the best and the wisest provision that has ever been made in any State of this Union to meet that very glaring evil that has existed for some time.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BOOHER. In that corporation article there is no provision for the order of the supreme court being carried into effect, is there?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know whether that is distinctly provided or not.

Mr. BOOHER. Absolutely not. A writ of error lies to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, and the appeal itself acts as a supersedeas, because there is no provision of the constitution putting that provision in force. Hence they do not need a restraining order. They have got it in the constitution itself.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BOOHER. The appeal simply does that, does it not?

Mr. WILLIS. No; I do not think it does.

Mr. BOOHER. Well, but there is no provision, if you will read it carefully, for the order to become effective.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman that if there is no provision in that respect, I do not assume that this grant of power here to this corporation commission is exclusive. I understand the legislature has the power, if there is any defect, to remedy that defect.

Mr. BOOHER. Do you not remember that Judge Fall, the author of that provision, stated to the committee time and again that they had deprived the legislature of all power to change it?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not remember any such statement as that; and I want to say that if Judge Fall or anybody else said that, the language in this constitution is not susceptible of any such interpretation, and that power is not exclusive.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman that there is nothing in the New Mexico constitution prohibiting the legislature from legislating, but the powers of the corporation commission are so fully and specifically defined that the legislature has nothing left to legislate on. The constitution itself legislates. That is the trouble with that provision in the constitution of New Mexico, and I want to corroborate what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] has said, that it was stated to this committee that it was the purpose of that article in the New Mexico constitution, absolutely to deprive the legislature of power to legislate with reference to such corporations in that State.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to proceed here, because I have occupied too much time already. Another point to which attention is called in the committee report is relative to the election laws of New Mexico. It is claimed that New Mexico does not have any good election laws. I have taken pains to study the New Mexico election laws. They are not in every respect as I should like them. I do not think they are perfect. I do not think the election laws of any State are perfect, but I want to say that New Mexico has a fairly good election law. You will find it in the Laws of New Mexico of 1909 at page 285. Briefly, here are some of the things you will find provided there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 15 minutes more.

Mr. WILLIS. The election laws of New Mexico provide for the secrecy of the ballot, for minority representation on the election board, for public notice, by publication, not less than 10 days before the election, giving full notice of the object of the election; prohibiting anyone but the person voting, the election officers, and a challenger from each political party coming within 30 feet of the polls on election day.

Providing for a fine or jail sentence, for misleading, directly or indirectly, or bribing, or in any manner interfering with any voter. Providing that such ballots shall be folded so as not to be seen, and so on. I will not weary you with them.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. Is it not a fact that these election laws proposed for New Merico are similar to those now in force in the State of Missouri?

Mr. WILLIS. If that is true, I am much obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. DYER. I understand from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] that that is a fact, and that New Mexico is made up in great part of former Missourians, for which we are all thankful, and thankful that they did not go from Chicago to New Mexico. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Now, I want to say to my good old friend from Missouri——

Mr. BOOHER. I am not any older than you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Well, then I will say to my good young friend from Missouri that that is one of the highest recommendations the people of New Mexico could possibly have, that a large part of them came away from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOOHER. I want to ask my friend if he will please enlighten the House why it was that when the enabling act was passed, and when these excellent election laws were in force, the enabling act did not permit the people to elect delegates under that law?

Mr. WILLIS. I have not gone into that matter, and I do not know why. It was not my fault that I was not here; I tried hard to get here. However, I am not going into that.

Mr. BOOHER. The enabling act provided that the election should be held under a law that had been repealed by the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico, a law that provided that all of the election officers might be taken from one party, and one of the witnesses before the Committee on Territories said that they were absolutely all taken from one party or from one gang of politicians.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to say to my young friend from Missouri that if he will turn to the laws of the Territory of New Mexico in 1909, he will find exactly the provision that I have been quoting.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; but that was passed before the enabling act was passed by Congress, and you did not hold the election under that law.

Mr. WILLIS. The point I am making is that it is absurd to provide election laws that are not half so good——

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman from Ohio mistakes my object. I say that they have an excellent election law, but why was it, if the gentleman knows, that they did not hold the election of delegates and the adoption of the constitution under this excellent law?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know. I was not in Congress then. The gentleman undoubtedly was and voted for the bill. Let him explain it when he comes to make his speech.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] was in the last Congress when a joint resolution passed approving the New Mexico constitution by a unanimous vote.

Mr. BOOHER. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. I voted for it then and I am going to vote for it now; but I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I propose to vote for an amendment that will enable the people of the State of New Mexico to amend their constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman, in answer to my question, says that the people of New Mexico who came from Missouri were to be congratulated that they left the State.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I did not mean it in an offensive way; I meant it as a compliment.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman spoke of commending certain counties in New Mexico for being Republican. I want to say to him that Missouri is a Republican State and has been for 12 years, and that we have a Republican governor, which is a great deal better than the gentleman can say of his own State. [Laughter.]

ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have enjoyed this colloquy highly, but I am going to finish. I want to call attention to the election law that a majority of the committee, in its infinite wisdom, has prepared. Look at it face to face. It is said that the election law of New Mexico is not sufficient, and so the committee makes one. Now, look at it, on page 8 of this House joint resolution, and I just want to show how it is going to work out. Beginning on line 1, page 8, this is provided by the committee, and I do not say this at all offensively, but I think the committee has made a tremendous mistake:

Said separate ballots shall be delivered only to the election officers authorized by law to receive and have the custody of the ballot boxes for use at said election and shall be delivered by them only to the individual voter at his request.

Do you not see this thing is loaded? I do not mean that offensively or corruptly, but I mean to say that it is unfair. Men are to be given an opportunity to vote on this thing only when, as they go into the booths at the time of the general election, they shall make a special personal request that they have one of these ballots. Now, then, I appeal to the sense of the membership of this House. You all know how men go into the voting places. You know how they vote. How many men will go in there and make that request? If there should happen to be election judges who are corrupt and who want this thing to go in a certain way, do you not see how easily they could work that? They could suggest to a man, "Do you not want to vote on the constitutional amendments?" and to some other man they thought was not going to vote right they would hand out another ballot and let it go at that. But look at this further—

And shall be delivered by them only to the individual voter at his request at the time he offers to vote at the said general election.

Now look at this further—

And shall have the initials of two election officers of opposite political parties written by them upon the back thereof.

Why, gentlemen, if you wanted to make a plan—and I know the committee did not want to do any such thing—for they are moved by as high a purpose in this as I am or any other man—if they wanted to make a plan whereby you would allow an election officer to put his initials on the ballot, do not gentlemen recognize that there you have the best possible way open to injustice and corruption in the election? This does not say how the initials shall be put on. If the officer wants to know how a man votes, all he has to do is to put his initials on in a certain way—with a little period here or a comma there, and he could have that understanding with himself, and there would be opened a way to perpetrate the grossest fraud under this provision.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if that provision which he has just been criticizing was not incorporated in this resolution upon the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. YOUNG], a Republican member of the committee, and voted for solidly by the committee, the gentleman himself included?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of a committee ought to know better than to make such a statement, in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The chairman does know that that is a violation of the rules of the House, but it has been going on all through this debate, and the gentleman from Illinois has not objected until now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman misunderstands the point. It is not the interruption, but it is the reference to divulging the action of the committee.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not misunderstand the point. All day long allusion has been made to what has taken place in the committee, and the gentleman from Illinois does not object to a statement of what went on there until now, when his friend is in a hole.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I decline to enter into a personal controversy that is so ridiculous as that suggested by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. And I do not want to enter into a personal controversy with a gentleman who is so insolent as to use language of that character.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order. The gentleman from Virginia, and he ought to know it, referred to the transactions of the committee in violation of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that to be the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Ohio has any desire to misrepresent the purpose of the committee in framing up this special ballot and providing for its initialing.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman that I desire to finish, and then the gentleman can get some time in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

THE PEOPLE OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not mean that in any discourteous sense, but I have gone on here long enough. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me, in view of the things that I have discussed here, that this action ought to be had—that the Territory of New Mexico ought to be admitted as a State, and ought to be admitted now without any further amendment or conditions.

I warn gentlemen that if you are going to tie this thing up with amendments you will do again what we have been doing for 50 or 60 years, and the result will be these people will be kept out of the Union. I want New Mexico, with her splendid people, her magnificent resources, to come into the Union and to come in now.

I tell you the people of that Territory have a magnificent history. Do not think of them as Mexicans, for they are not. They never were Mexicans. They were ruled for a hundred years directly from Spain, with no connection with Mexico, and then, when the Mexican Republic was established, there was only nominal control over the people of this Territory; and remember that in 1846—at any rate, at the time of the Mexican War—when Gen. Kearny went down into that country he carried a sword in one hand, he carried his commission as governor in the other, and in his mouth a promise to the people of that Territory that they should come into this great American Union. The people of New Mexico are part of our national life. In the great Civil War, when the men of the North and the men of the South were struggling and fighting as men never struggled and fought before, New Mexico contributed of the best of her blood to both sides of that conflict——

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. And the Spanish-American War.

Mr. WILLIS. And in the Spanish-American War, as my friend from Oklahoma suggests, there were no braver men who shouldered their muskets and marched away to that war in 1898 than the boys who came from New Mexico.

In the great Civil War, I want men to remember, in the great army that wore the gray and which fought so magnificently, an army that was exemplified by the splendid 18,000 who went charging up the hillside yonder at Gettysburg, there were men from New Mexico; and in the lines of blue that met and repulsed the charge, not only at Gettysburg, but on many other battle fields, there were men from New Mexico. They are part of our national life, and they ought to be a part of this great Nation. They ought to be part of it now. I say nothing unkind of Arizona. I believe the people of Arizona, while they have a constitution that may not be entirely satisfactory to you or to me, ought to be in the American Union; but there is one thing that to me seems to be so subversive of the American principle of the independence of the judiciary that I should not be willing to admit that State with that provision in its constitution. This minority report provides that the people of the Territory of Arizona shall vote on the question of the recall of judges and shall not come in until that is stricken out of the constitution, and I say that knowing that the day after, if they want to do so, as a State of this American Union, they have a right to put that clause back into their constitution.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of bringing in those two States, I am in favor of bringing them in now. I am in favor of putting two more stars yonder in that flag, and it is a great flag.

> Your flag and my flag, O how much it holds;
> Your land and my land, safe beneath its folds;
> Your heart and my heart beats quicker at the sight,
> Sun-kissed and wind-tossed, the red, the blue, and white.
> The one flag, the great flag, the flag for me and you;
> Glorified, all else beside, the red, the white, and blue.

Put two more stars in that flag by admitting New Mexico and Arizona into this splendid galaxy of Commonwealths. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would not take the time of the House to discuss this bill were it not for the fact that the principles involved are fundamental, and that the passage or defeat of the bill involves the preservation or denial of natural rights which are inherent in the citizen and form a large part of the very foundation and structure of free government.

At the very outset, let me say that any discussion of the provisions of either the constitution of New Mexico or Arizona is beside the question, for while it must be admitted that Congress of the United States has the power to admit these Territories to the Union or to refuse to admit them, it is not necessary that Congress should give any reason for its refusal to admit them, should it so determine.

I believe that both should be admitted to the Union if the conditions, environments, and civilization that exists in each reasonably conduces to the conclusion that the inhabitants thereof are capable of self-government.

No question has been raised or can be raised upon that proposition, and, conceding the capacity of the citizens of these Territories for self-government, the conclusion seems to me necessarily to follow that they should be permitted to adopt and establish constitutions in conformity with the judgment of the composite citizenship.

Such constitutions must necessarily conform to the conditions, institutions, and stage of civilization which are best known and appreciated by the citizens of the Territories themselves.

But certain objections to specific provisions in these constitutions have been made the basis of the opposition to the admission of one or the other of these Territories to the Union, and inasmuch as these issues have been raised and are the basis upon which the admission of the Territories is to be determined under the pending bill, it is proper to discuss these objections in their relation to government.

The opposition to the admission of Arizona as a State centers upon the proposition that the provisions of the proposed constitution of Arizona contained in articles 4 and 8 and providing for the initiative, referendum, and recall are in violation of section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

The provisions of articles 4 and 8 of the constitution of Arizona provide for three distinct reservations of power to the people of that State:

First, the right to initiate or propose legislation upon a petition of 10 per cent of the voters, and amendments to the constitution upon petition of 15 per cent of the voters.

Second, the right to require that laws passed by the legislature, except emergency measures, shall be referred to the people for approval or rejection upon the petition of 5 per cent of the voters.

Third, the right to require that the question of the recall of an elective official shall be referred to the people upon the petition of 25 per cent of the legal voters.

The proposed provisions constitute the foundation upon which will be erected a system of popular government which is in all essential particulars identical with what is popularly known as the Oregon system. This system provides not only for the initiative, referendum, and recall, but provides as well for the issuance of books or pamphlets containing the text of all proposed laws and amendments to the constitution and the arguments for and against them. It also provides adequate legislation for the secret ballot and the registration of voters, and to prevent corrupt practices in the use of money or patronage in elections.

It must be conceded that if the provisions of the Arizona constitution just referred to are violative of the Constitution of the United States, that the same provisions contained in the fundamental law of Oregon, Arkansas, Washington, South Dakota, and other States are likewise in violation of the Constitution.

The supreme courts of Oregon and South Dakota have held that the provisions for the initiative and referendum do not violate section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution. In addition, the Congress of the United States has, in effect at least, recognized the validity of these provisions by admitting Oklahoma into the Union, the constitution of that State providing for the initiative and referendum at the time of its admission.

The proposition advanced by the opposition is in effect tantamount to the charge that the provisions for the initiative, referendum, and recall are incompatible with the institutions of a republican form of government.

I shall restrict what I have to say upon the subject to an effort to demonstrate that the provisions referred to are in complete harmony with a republican form of government as conformed to the history, development, and evolution of our industrial and political institutions, and that in addition they offer the only practical and reasonable safeguard of the inherent and natural right of the people to govern themselves and provide the only remedy against a system of domination of political parties by selfish interests, acting through a political boss, which has almost annihilated and abrogated the power of the people to make effective the composite will of the majority.

Since the very beginning of history there has existed in the politics of government a reactionary force and a progressive force. The reactionary force has always claimed and sought to assert the autocratic assumption and usurpation by the few of the power and authority of government. The progressive force has tended toward a lodgement of political power finding expression in the purpose and will of the people.

Progress has been the result of long-continued protest by the people against the usurpation by the few of governmental power. There never has been and never will be any progress which does not have its inception in the common people. History confirms the belief that progress is effected only where the specific reform has come from and received the warrant of the mandate of the people, and this regardless of what is claimed to be the leadership of the period.

The old feudal barons never left their castles on the summit of some high mountain peak to come down in the valleys and lift the people out of the bondage of slavery, but the people with the heart throb of liberty in their breasts climbed the mountain heights and bore down the feudal walls to wrest from the mailed hands of the oppressor the priceless boon of human freedom.

In the very beginning of society political power and leadership was established by the force of superior physical strength. Men submitted to the power of superior strength, but did not concede its authority.

But from time to time, as the chains of reaction bore backward too heavily, they revolted against the established forms of government and leadership and established a new system of varying degree less despotic than the old.

As society became more complicated and as the people became more enlightened, as they slowly progressed against the reactionary force and tendency of despotic leadership, it became necessary to find some more potent warrant for the assumption of governmental power than the mere authority of superior strength.

The reactionary force met this condition with a new theory. Basing its foundation upon alleged divine authority, it gave birth to the claim of divine right of kings and the right of succession and the theory that political power was a God-given gift.

It was to escape this dogmatic assumption and claim of authority that our forefathers turned their faces to the west and came across the seemingly boundless deep to the unknown continent of the west and established through the revolution a new nation, founded upon the principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

In connection with the doctrine of the consent of the governed, Prof. Lester Ward says:

> It is no longer the consent, but the positively known will of the governed from which government now derives its power.

I call your particular attention to this statement because it measures with extreme accuracy the difference between the conditions and environment of the period immediately following the Revolution and those of the present, and because it spans exactly the progress and evolution of our political and industrial institutions.

The doctrine of the consent of the governed is distinctly Hamiltonian. It conforms perfectly with that period in our national history when the balance between success and failure of the republican form of government was extremely delicate, when our people and our institutions were only by a generation removed from tyranny and despotism of monarchical and aristocratic forms of government. It is in complete harmony with the system of delegated government. It harmonizes perfectly with that period of our history when the sending of a letter was a matter of considerable concern and no small expense, when communication was by word of mouth or by letter of hand, when transportation was by stage coach, when a journey from Philadelphia to New York was a matter of days, when the whole population of the colonies scattered along the entire Atlantic coast was less than the present population of my native State of Minnesota. The art of printing was in its infancy and the newspaper a luxury. Education was the peculiar privilege of the well to do.

By the same analogy and logic it is entirely out of harmony with the spirit, conditions, and environment of the present day, when railroad, telegraph, and telephone have annihilated time and space, when news of to-day of Tokyo, Paris, London, New York, and San Francisco will be upon every man's breakfast table to-morrow, when education has reached a high stage of development, when 90 persons out of every 100 are able to read and write.

Interpreted in the light of the development of the boss system of government and the present stage of civilization and development of our industrial institutions, government by consent of the governed in the place of government by participation of the governed is bad government. It means, as it did 135 years ago, delegated government. It means remoteness of responsibility to the people and consequently lack of accountability to the composite citizen.

And above all, it means the lack of this participation in government by the people which is the only means of attaining the best that is possible of attainment in free government.

Under this system the politician or party boss, who is always alert in the service of his master, the special interest—the campaign contributor, and the special interest itself—dominates and directs political activity. It gives to the legislator an irrevocable power of attorney during his term to establish the rules and laws by which the composite citizen must regulate his conduct, and this without any right on the part of the citizen to approve or reject his action.

It permits the executive to exercise a corrupt and unfaithful judgment in the administration of the law, while it subjects the judiciary to the charge, justly or unjustly, of domination and influence of special and privileged classes.

It widens the breach between classes and tends toward a lack of sympathy and understanding between them by setting the rights of one class in opposition to the special privileges of the others.

On the other hand, popular government is the necessary sequence of the development and evolution of the citizen and of our institutions. It is a government by the people for the people, not by consent, but by participation.

Under this system of popular government the corrupt use of money is minimized, the political boss practically eliminated, and the accountability of the official to the individual or the special interests is removed. Organization is effected for the purpose of advocacy of principle and the advancement of the general welfare.

The claim that the proposed constitution of Arizona, enlarging popular government as it does by the initiative, referendum, and recall, is violative of the provision of the Federal Constitution which declares that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government" has no real foundation in fact.

Not only is the popular government proposed in the Arizona constitution absolutely in harmony with the spirit of a "republican form of government," but the provisions in the American Constitution which provide that the General Government shall guarantee to the States a republican form of government was not intended as a limitation upon the power of the people to develop along lines of free government, but was intended to insure against a relapse from free government and as a guaranty against the development of systems and conditions designed to abridge the right of the people to govern themselves.

The motive which moved the framers of the Constitution of the United States and of the several colonies to depart from the custom of their fathers and to establish a written and permanent Constitution was not the fear that the people would become incapable of self-government, but, on the contrary, it was the fear that systems and devices would be evolved whereby the composite will of the people would be thwarted and the very machinery provided to make certain the ascertainment of the will of the majority should be so perverted as to establish as the law the will of the few in the place of the purpose of the many.

The very language of the constitutional provisions of the original States established absolutely the purpose of the people to reserve to themselves the absolute right of government.

A proposed constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was rejected by its people because it failed to include the reservation of the right of self-government.

Subsequently, in 1780, a constitution was adopted by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, ratified by the direct vote of the people at town meetings, which provided:

> The people of the Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

A Virginia bill of rights of 1776 declared "that all power is vested in and consequently derived from the people."

Similar provisions are to be found in the bills of rights in practically every State in the Union.

The test of whether a government is republican in form or not is, in the final analysis, determined by the recognition or failure to recognize the people as the source of political power and provide adequate and appropriate machinery whereby they may direct and participate in the making of the rules and laws under which they are to live.

Mr. Madison describes a republican form of government as one—> which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices, during pleasure, for a limited period or during good behavior.

It will hardly be contended that the initiative, referendum, and recall will not provide adequate means for the ascertainment of the will of the majority or that it fails in recognition of the people as the source of political power.

That the fear of the forefathers that systems would be devised whereby the machinery of government for ascertaining and carrying out the composite will of the people would be subverted has proven to be a well-grounded fear is sufficiently demonstrated by the experience in this country, under the system of delegated government which prevails in most of our States.

Under the system of delegated government the official is responsible only to the party boss, and through him to the selfish interests which he serves. Under this system the special interests, campaign contributor, and party boss, under the guise of organization, dominate political action, while under the popular government the responsibility of the official is directly to the composite citizen. Organization under popular government is the coming together of those seeking the several welfare and the advocacy of principle.

This system secures equality of opportunity and of political rights. It establishes the composite citizen as the master, to whom alone the public servant is accountable.

Now, reduced to the last analysis the object and purpose of government, and this is of course axiomatic, is to accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number or, perhaps more accurately, to preserve the common welfare.

Hence the efficiency and excellence of a government must be determined first by the agencies, instrumentalities, and facilities which it offers for developing the interest of and affording the opportunity for direct participation by the people, as this alone insures general welfare as the goal of political and governmental activities.

Second, the adequacy and directness of the machinery provided for determining the will and purpose of the people, and, finally, the sufficiency of the guaranty that these desires thus ascertained will be carried into effect by those in authority.

To my mind no system has ever been devised which so nearly approximates the ideal of efficiency and excellence that I have just referred to as does the Oregon system, providing as it does a special method by which the laws proposed, and the arguments for and against them, are placed in the hands of the voters before the election in the shape of a book or pamphlet, thereby affording them the information upon which an intelligent opinion can be formed, and providing a simple and direct method by which the composite judgment of the voters upon measures and principles can be ascertained, at the same time providing a guaranty in the recall that the will and purpose thus ascertained will be carried into effect.

It is, of course, essential in the administration of these features that they be accompanied by adequate election and registration laws and by efficient legislation to prevent corrupt practices, as is accomplished under the Oregon system. This system does away with all graft and boss rule. It fixes a direct responsibility for the laws upon the people who are to live under them. It tends to discourage controversy because of its known results in establishing the laws by a clear and uncorrupted majority.

Now, it will be claimed, as it always has been by those who advocate boss rule, that the people are not competent to legislate directly.

If this is the fact, which I would not for one moment concede, it is not a very pleasing commentary upon the educational efficiency of more than 100 years of boss, delegate, and convention rule, but, on the contrary, proves that government by the boss or delegate system under guise of organization is a failure as an educator in public affairs.

It points conclusively to our inability to make progress in government under that system, and of the necessity of adopting some other and more direct system which will bring the people into closer relations with public affairs, and into a more intimate acquaintance and sympathy with the needs and requirements of the many.

The initiative and referendum conduces to this understanding and mutual forbearance by promoting a familiarity with measures, principles, and conditions by guaranteeing an equality of political opportunity and political rights and by providing a swift and sure remedy for official infidelity and malfeasance.

While many accept the initiative and referendum as a logical sequence of government by the people, some hesitate to accept the recall, especially as applied to the judiciary.

I yield to no one in my respect for individuals who compose the judiciary, but I contend that the recall is no more intended for the just and upright judge than the law against theft is intended for the just and honest citizen. There is just as much reason and the same foundation for the one law as for the other.

One argument advanced against the recall of the judiciary is the claim that it will destroy the fearlessness of judges. This is a tacit admission that independence is not necessary in other officials. The absurdity of this distinction is at once apparent. The judge no more has the several and material welfare of the people in his keeping than has the legislator. The reductio ad absurdum is reached when it is declared that the recall destroys the independence of an official and hence ought not to apply to the judicial office, leaving it to be implied that no harm can come from destroying the independence of other officials. In fact, it does not destroy the fearlessness or independence of any official. A judge who decides a case because he feels that he is not accountable to anyone is not fearless. The fearless judge is one who acts only from a regard to duty. The absolute and unaccountable power is the immemorial refuge of him who is afraid. A responsible power can only be properly wielded by him who knows no fear save the fear that he may fail in the performance of duty.

Again, as courts deal more and more with political questions, making and unmaking laws, their function becomes political. While they act through the medium of the court, the making or unmaking of law is nevertheless a legislative function, and should be just as much subject to final control by the people as though they legislated through the medium of the legislature.

Fundamentally there can be no place in free government for an absolute and irresponsible power. To transfer such a power from the throne to the bench makes a travesty of the sacrifice the effort for free government has cost. Free government in the last analysis admits of no power anywhere above the people, not responsible to the people.

I hold that the tenure of office of a public servant is a matter of but little importance viewed from the standpoint of the inability of the Government to do without his services. I hold that no man's tenure of office as an individual is necessary to the life of the Republic, but viewed from the standpoint of the inability of the people to remove that public servant, if his service be unfaithful, by some direct and efficient method, it becomes of the highest importance.

I believe that the lack of a reasonable and efficient method of machinery for removing the corrupt or inefficient public official, presents a much more serious danger than is presented by the possibility that the people might, in a moment of passion and unreason, unjustly recall the officer.

There is every reason why we should remove the judiciary from any possible domination of or responsibility to the special interest. There is no reason why the judiciary should not be responsive to the progress and evolution of the composite citizen.

I desire here to say just a word for the benefit of those who pretend to find in these measures the vain visionings and insane workings of diseased and disordered minds, who profess to believe that their adoption by the States of the Union will lead at once to the ruin of our republican institutions and ultimate political chaos.

These measures are not novelties. The initiative and referendum were adopted in Switzerland in 1874, after a long conflict covering a period of 60 years between reactionary forces contending for a centralized government and the people contending for the power of self-government. These measures have been in use in Switzerland for more than 35 years. To-day the Government of Switzerland is acknowledged to be the least corrupt and its people the most tranquil in the world.

Eight States have adopted the initiative and referendum; more than 20 are committed to their adoption. More than 100 cities in the United States have adopted the recall in connection with the commission form of government.

I commend the following statement of Numa Droz, an eminent conservative Swiss writer, to those who pretend to fear that the initiative and referendum will result in anarchy:

> It may be affirmed that on the whole the Swiss people have used their new powers with moderation. The optional referendum has often hindered, but it has never destroyed; it is not within its scope to do so. It is an instrument of conservation, not of demolition. It acts as a restraint on the authorities; it obliges them to govern with caution; but it does not make government impossible, for it is not in its power to disorganize the State.

The further development of popular government is but the logical sequence of the operation of the forces of free government itself.

Our fathers could not agree to the people voting directly for President, and made provision in the Constitution for an indirect method. This method provided that the people should elect presidential electors, who in turn should elect a President. This violated a natural law—the law that free government is destined to be popular government. The people soon began to hold conventions and nominate a candidate for President and to vote for him, until to-day, while the elector is retained, he simply executes the will of the voters, and so automatic has this become that the voter often does not even know who the elector is. In fact, in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent we have gone so far as to provide by law that a mark placed after the name of the candidate for President carries with it the vote for all the electors.

Obedient to the same law of development, the day is not far distant when the people will provide means through a presidential preference law for direct expression of their choice for party candidates, and thus themselves practically nominate their candidates for President. In fact, some States already have this law in force. Its general adoption is inevitable, for it is repugnant to the spirit of free government that a man should, through the power of patronage or appointment, dictate who his successor should be or force his own renomination.

The strength of the demand for popular election of United States Senators is but another illustration of the trend to popular government.

The initiative, referendum, and recall are but sequential steps in the evolution of free government, for a government of the people must of necessity be a government by the people.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN].

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I can make no statement of facts to which attention has not already been directed during the discussion of this resolution. The law with reference thereto is plain, direct, and unchallenged. My strong conviction that both the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are entitled to be admitted to the Union as States upon the terms proposed in the report of the majority of the committee, and not the necessity for any such advocacy, alone prompts me to address the House.

It has never been questioned that the territory embraced within the limits of New Mexico and Arizona, and, in fact, all territory acquired by the United States, could be admitted into the Union only upon the condition of compliance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the ordinance of 1787. And it is equally true that the people of any State have a right to change their fundamental laws to suit their conditions and to make them conform to what they deem best for their interests, prosperity, and happiness, provided a republican form of government is maintained. The majority of the Committee on Territories has reported favorably as to the admission of both New Mexico and Arizona, with a proviso as to Arizona that article 8, which embraces the feature including the recall of judges, shall be resubmitted to a vote of its people; and, as to New Mexico, that article 19, which, in the opinion of the committee and in my opinion, makes it exceedingly difficult to amend its constitution, and almost impossible to do so, shall be resubmitted to a vote of the people of New Mexico.

I speak by authority of no one, but after having heard the report of the majority of the committee read and having listened to the discussion which has taken place in reference to this resolution, I venture the opinion that the recommendation that article 8 be resubmitted to the people of Arizona is because of the fact that the people of that Territory are anxious to avoid any further delay as to their entrance into the Union and because of the well-known views of President Taft as to the recall of judges and doubt as to what his attitude may be.

No further reason need be sought for the resubmission of article 19 to the people of New Mexico than one founded upon the dictates of humanity. It gives those people the opportunity to change in fundamental respects a constitution which, though republican in form, has the brand of the trusts stamped upon the instrument as distinctly as has the Texas pony that of its owner upon its body.

The minority of the committee recommend without qualification and unconditionally the admission of New Mexico, and they recommend the admission of Arizona upon the condition that article 8 be resubmitted to a vote of the people, and that it shall be so construed as to exclude judges from the recall feature, and that the people of Arizona shall consent to that construction by their vote. The resubmission to a vote of article 19 is an event which should be hailed with delight by the people of New Mexico. It is sincerely to be hoped that they will avail themselves of the opportunity to be rid of a feature in their constitution which must necessarily in the future hinder their advancement and retard their prosperity and happiness. The student of the histories of republics will search in vain for an article in the constitution of any one of them more calculated to excite suspicion and distrust. In fact, he will find nothing like it. It can serve no good purpose. It should be destroyed by the vote of the people of New Mexico, who might with propriety preserve a copy of it in a museum to be shown to their youth in the years to come as something to be shunned by a people living under a republican form of Government who wish to enjoy its privileges and blessings.

Neither the Constitution of the United States nor any act of Congress made it necessary that legislation be enacted which should authorize the people of the two Territories to apply for admission to the Union. Many States have been admitted without enabling acts. The method of procedure was left by Congress to them and the requisite initial steps adopted and perfected by them. By authority given by section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, the question of admission of a State to the Union is left to the discretion of Congress, and by virtue of that power the act to enable the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico to adopt constitutions, to frame State governments, and to apply for admission into the Union was passed by the Sixty-first Congress and approved by President Taft on the 20th of June, 1910. The constitution of New Mexico was adopted on the 21st of January, 1911.

The constitution of Arizona was adopted on the 7th day of February, 1911. Both are republican in form. The enabling act made as a prerequisite to admission as States that the constitutions of these Territories should be republican in form and that they should make no distinction on account of race or color as to civil or political rights, and that they should not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, nor to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. The requirements of and limitations upon each Territory are the same. Although no legislation was necessary to enable these Territories to apply for admission, inasmuch as Congress has seen fit to pass the enabling act of June 20, 1910, beyond all doubt that act will be fully considered in every respect. The constitution of New Mexico is republican in form, but it has features which do not accord with the sentiments of those who wish to enjoy the blessings of free men and also who realize the supreme importance of education to a free people. I shall notice these objectionable features before I conclude.

It is urged against the admission of Arizona into the Union, not that its territory is insufficient, not that its population is not large enough, not that its people are not loyal and true, not that it has not fulfilled every requirement of the enabling act, not for any reason, only save and except that it violates the Constitution of the United States, Article IV, section 4, in that there is embraced in its constitution the system of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall.

This objection can be sustained neither by reason nor authority. Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States provides that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

It was repeatedly asked here when this discussion first commenced, What is a legal definition of a republican form of government? There is no definition given of a republican form of government in our National Constitution, but it is defined elsewhere by authority so high and in terms so plain and simple that no one can misunderstand. The Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion rendered in Second Dallas, page 419, which you will find reported there, thus defines it:

One so constructed in principle that the supreme power resides in the body of the people.

The Supreme Court of the State of Oregon says:

A republican form of government is administered by representatives chosen or appointed by the people or by their authority.

In another opinion rendered by the same court will be found these words:

Under a republican form of government representatives are responsible to the will of the people, and the closer the power to enact laws and control officials lies with the people the more certain it is republican in form and principle.

With these definitions as a guide, a close and impartial scrutiny of the constitution of Arizona will show not only that it violates neither Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States nor any provision of the Constitution of the United States in any respect. And I go further and say that a system of government embodying the features of the initiative and referendum is vitalized in its very life, and that the principle for which that system stands—that all power is vested in and derived from the people—is made more enduring and secure.

The features of the constitution of Arizona which are objectionable to some will be found in articles 4 and 8, which, by permission, will be printed with my remarks.

ARTICLE 4.—LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

1. INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

SEC. 1. (1) The legislative authority of the State shall be vested in a legislature, consisting of a senate and a house of representatives, but the people reserve the power to propose laws and amendments to the constitution and to enact or reject such laws and amendments at the polls, independently of the legislature, and they also reserve, for use at their own option, the power to approve or reject at the polls any act or item, section, or part of any act of the legislature.

(2) The first of these reserved powers is the initiative. Under this power 10 per cent of the qualified electors shall have the right to propose any measure, and 15 per cent shall have the right to propose any amendment to the constitution.

(3) The second of these reserved powers is the referendum. Under this power the legislature, or 5 per cent of the qualified electors, may order the submission to the people at the polls of any measure or item, section, or part of any measure enacted by the legislature, except laws immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, or for the support and maintenance of the departments of the State government and State institutions; but to allow opportunity for referendum petitions, no act passed by the legislature shall be operative for 90 days after the close of the session of the legislature enacting such measure, except such as require earlier operation to preserve the public peace, health, or safety, or to provide appropriations for the support and maintenance of the departments of State and of State institutions: Provided, That no such emergency measure shall be considered passed by the legislature unless it shall state in a separate section why it is necessary that it shall become immediately operative, and shall be approved by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays, and also approved by the governor; and should such measure be vetoed by the governor, it shall not become a law unless it shall be approved by the votes of three-fourths of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays.

(4) All petitions submitted under the power of the initiative shall be known as initiative petitions, and shall be filed with the secretary of state not less than four months preceding the date of the election at which the measures so proposed are to be voted upon. All petitions submitted under the power of the referendum shall be known as referendum petitions, and shall be filed with the secretary of state not more than 90 days after the final adjournment of the session of the legislature which shall have passed the measure to which the referendum is applied. The filing of a referendum petition against any item, section, or part of any measure shall not prevent the remainder of such measure from becoming operative.

(5) Any measure of amendment to the constitution proposed under the initiative, and any measure to which the referendum is applied, shall be referred to a vote of the qualified electors, and shall become law when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon and upon proclamation of the governor, and not otherwise.

(6) The veto power of the governor shall not extend to initiative or referendum measures approved by a majority of the qualified electors.

(7) The whole number of votes cast for all candidates for governor at the general election last preceding the filing of any initiative or referendum petition on a State or county measure shall be the basis on which the number of qualified electors required to sign such petition shall be computed.

(8) The powers of the initiative and the referendum are hereby further reserved to the qualified electors of every incorporated city, town, and county as to all local, city, town, or county matters on which such incorporated cities, towns, and counties are or shall be empowered by general laws to legislate. Such incorporated cities, towns, and counties may prescribe the manner of exercising said power within the restrictions of general laws. Under the power of the initiative 15 per cent of the qualified electors may propose measures on such local, city, town, or county matters, and 10 per cent of the electors may propose the referendum on legislation enacted within and by such city, town, or county. Until provided by general law, said cities and towns may prescribe the basis on which said percentages shall be computed.

(9) Every initiative or referendum petition shall be addressed to the secretary of state in the case of petitions for or on State measures, and to the clerk of the board of supervisors, city clerk, or corresponding officer in the case of petitions for or on county, city, or town measures; and shall contain the declaration of each petitioner, for himself, that he is a qualified elector of the State (and in the case of petitions for or on city, town, or county measures, of the city, town, or county affected), his post-office address, the street and number, if any, of his residence, and the date on which he signed such petition. Each sheet containing petitioners' signatures shall be attached to a full and correct copy of the title and text of the measure so proposed to be initiated or referred to the people, and every sheet of every such petition containing signatures shall be verified by the affidavit of the person who circulated said sheet or petition, setting forth that each of the names on said sheet was signed in the presence of the affiant, and that in the belief of the affiant each signer was a qualified elector of the State, or in the case of a city, town, or county measure, of the city, town, or county affected by the measure so proposed to be initiated or referred to the people.

(10) When any initiative or referendum petition or any measure referred to the people by the legislature shall be filed, in accordance with this section, with the secretary of state, he shall cause to be printed on the official ballot of the next regular general election the title and number of said measure, together with the words "Yes" and "No" in such manner that the electors may express at the polls their approval or disapproval of the measure.

(11) The text of all measures to be submitted shall be published as proposed amendments to the constitution are published, and in submitting such measures and proposed amendments the secretary of state and all other officers shall be guided by the general law until legislation shall be especially provided therefor.

(12) If two or more conflicting measures or amendments to the constitution shall be approved by the people at the same election, the measure or amendment receiving the greatest number of affirmative votes shall prevail in all particulars as to which there is a conflict.

(13) It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor and the chief justice of the supreme court, to canvass the votes for and against each such measure or proposed amendment to the constitution within 30 days after the election, and upon the completion of the canvass the governor shall forthwith issue a proclamation giving the whole number of votes cast for and against each measure or proposed amendment, and declaring such measures or amendments as are approved by a majority of those voting thereon to be law.

(14) This section shall not be construed to deprive the legislature of the right to enact any measure.

(15) This section of the constitution shall be, in all respects, self-executing.

SEC. 2. The legislature shall provide a penalty for any willful violation of any of the provisions of the preceding section.

ARTICLE 8.—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

1. RECALL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

SECTION 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the number of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.

SEC. 2. Every recall petition must contain a general statement in not more than 200 words of the grounds of such demand, and must be filed in the office in which petitions for nominations to the office held by the incumbent are required to be filed. The signatures to such recall petition need not all be on one sheet of paper, but each signer must add to his signature the date of his signing said petition and his place of residence, giving his street and number, if any, should he reside in a town or city. One of the signers of each sheet of such petition, or the person circulating such sheet, must make and subscribe an oath on said sheet that the signatures thereon are genuine.

SEC. 3. If said officer shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted, and the vacancy shall be filled as may be provided by law. If he shall not resign within five days after a recall petition is filed, a special election shall be ordered to be held, not less than 20 nor more than 30 days after such order, to determine whether such officer shall be recalled. On the ballots at said election shall be printed the reasons, as set forth in the petition, for demanding his recall, and, in not more than 200 words, the officer's justification of his course in office. He shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of said election shall have been officially declared.

SEC. 4. Unless he otherwise request, in writing, his name shall be placed as a candidate on the official ballot without nomination. Other candidates for the office may be nominated to be voted for at said election. The candidate who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared elected for the remainder of the term. Unless the incumbent receive the highest number of votes, he shall be deemed to be removed from office, upon qualification of his successor. In the event that his successor shall not qualify within five days after the result of said election shall have been declared, the said office shall be vacant, and may be filled as provided by law.

SEC. 5. No recall petition shall be circulated against any officer until he shall have held his office for a period of six months, except that it may be filed against a member of the legislature at any time after five days from the beginning of the first session after his election. After one recall petition and election no further recall petition shall be filed against the same officer during the term for which he was elected, unless petitioners signing such petition shall first pay into the public treasury which has paid such election expenses all expenses of the preceding election.

SEC. 6. The general election laws shall apply to recall elections in so far as applicable. Laws necessary to facilitate the operation of the provisions of this article shall be enacted, including provision for payment by the public treasury of the reasonable special election campaign expenses of such officer.

When the people of Arizona adopted a constitution embracing the features of the initiative and referendum they reserved to themselves powers which have belonged to the people of this country from the day that the Republic was formed. They discovered no new doctrine. They simply reserved in a written constitution powers which had been recognized and asserted from colonial days. Many States have adopted constitutions with the initiative and referendum, and their representatives have been admitted to Congress without dispute. What penalties shall those splendid Commonwealths pay for adopting constitutions which recognize the sovereignty of the people instead of the sovereignty of money? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Who will say that a system is wrong which makes its representatives responsible to the will of the people and forces them to pass laws demanded by their wants and necessities, and if the representative refuses so to do, gives the opportunity to redress the wrongs of omission and commission? Shall the great truths written in the Constitution of the United States, in the Declaration of Independence, in the bills of rights of many of the sovereign States, be trampled under foot and forgotten and the dicta of corporate power substituted therefor? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the people of Arizona adopted the features of the initiative and referendum they made plutocracy impossible within the borders of that Territory so long as the people remain honest and incorruptible. When a people become venal and corrupt, then no constitution will save them, and they tread the paths followed by the cities and States of other days, now remembered only for their vices, their follies, and their crimes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The reassertion by the people of Arizona and other States of powers which have from the commencement of this Government belonged to the people, but which too long have been allowed to remain dormant, was simply a revolt against conditions existing in different portions of this Republic.

They had seen elections bought and legislatures debauched with money extorted from a struggling people, with the hideous specter of bribery and corruption walking unabashed throughout the land. The brave and manly people who dwell in that great region of our country known as the Northwest sounded the bugle blast of freedom against the unjust and cruel exactions of money, against corrupt practices in high places, and against graft in all its varied forms. [Applause.] And the music of that clarion call is resounding through every portion of this land, and day by day it grows more distinct and clear, carrying with it the tidings of a mighty and crowning triumph soon to be won, and with that triumph the redemption of a people from a burden of grievous wrongs. [Applause.]

The issue has been made whether this country shall be governed according to the will of the people, untrammeled by the power of money, or whether it shall be surrendered to the Cossacks of greed, self-styled kings of finance. [Applause.] This fight will never end until the right of the people to govern is recognized from ocean to ocean, and in the struggle the flag of the Democratic Party will be seen, where it ever has been in every contest for the supremacy of the rights of the people, far to the front [applause], upon its brilliant folds written in letters of everlasting light, "Our common country, one and indivisible, now and forever; equal rights for all and special privileges to none." [Applause.]

In my opinion the most objectionable feature, as has been stated, in the constitution of Arizona is the recall of judges. I was born and reared in a State where a supreme reverence for the judiciary is one of the earliest lessons taught our youth, and I have always thought it was well that it was so.

North Carolina, my home, has furnished many illustrious names which have illumined the judicial history of this land. Chief Justice Ruffin was, by common consent, one of the greatest equity lawyers who ever sat upon the bench in this or any other country. He ranked with Story, and his decisions have been read with approval in Westminster Hall. Our present Chief Justice, Walter Clark, is one of the greatest common-law judges in this era of distinguished lawyers.

It may be that my environments influence my judgment, but I can not but conclude that the recall of judges has a tendency to degrade the judiciary and to affect injuriously its independence. [Applause.] Others differ from me; distinguished lawyers and judges, I am told. It is sufficient to say, however, that so far as the proper determination of the question at issue is involved, the admission of Arizona into the Union, it makes no difference whether their opinion is correct or mine. [Applause.] Arizona had a perfect moral and legal right to frame her constitution. If the people of Arizona made a mistake, it is their mistake and not ours, and it in no way affects the right of Arizona to admission to the Union. I undertake to say, with all deference, that no authority from a respectable court can be shown to the contrary. [Applause.]

It is remarkable that the only opposition to the admission of Arizona comes from those who favor the admission of New Mexico. The constitutions of both are republican in form, and both are entitled to admission when the terms imposed by the majority of the committee have been complied with. But inasmuch as the constitution of Arizona has been criticized, I think it is fair and just to call your attention very briefly to some of the features of the constitution of New Mexico.

Without morality and education no free republic can live. And yet, with this everlasting truth confronting them, the people of New Mexico adopted a constitution which, by section 3, article 7, makes an educational qualification for the right to vote, to sit on a jury, or to hold office impossible; and to perpetuate this burden it further provides that it shall require the vote of three-fourths of all the electors in the State and of two-thirds in each county to carry an amendment.

You will be consternated also when you consider the vast power that is conferred upon the State corporation commission by section 7, article 11, of the constitution of New Mexico, especially when you realize that the danger which is liable to arise from the misuse of that power can not be corrected by legislative enactment. And to hold this power securely article 19, section 1, makes an amendment to the constitution of New Mexico practically impossible, or, at least, exceedingly difficult.

ARTICLE 11.

SEC. 7. The commission shall have power, and be charged with the duty of fixing, determining, supervising, regulating, and controlling all charges and rates of railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers within the State; to require railway companies to provide and maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express; and to provide and maintain necessary crossings, culverts, and sidings upon and alongside of their roadbeds whenever in the judgment of the commission the public interests demand, and as may be reasonable and just. The commission shall also have power and be charged with the duty to make and enforce reasonable and just rules requiring the supplying of cars and equipment for the use of shippers and passengers, and to require all intrastate railways, transportation companies, or common carriers to provide such reasonable safety appliances in connection with all equipment as may be necessary and proper for the safety of its employees and the public, and as are now and may be required by the Federal laws, rules, and regulations governing interstate commerce. The commission shall have power to change or alter such rates, to change, alter, or amend its orders, rules, regulations, or determinations, and to enforce the same in the manner prescribed herein: Provided, That in the matter of fixing rates of telephone and telegraph companies due consideration shall be given to the earnings, investment, and expenditure as a whole within the State.

The commission shall have power to subpœna witnesses and enforce their attendance before the commission through any district courts or the supreme court of the State, and through such court to punish for contempt, and it shall have power, upon a hearing, to determine and decide any question given to it herein, and in case of failure or refusal of any person, company, or corporation to comply with any order within the time limit therein, unless an order of removal shall have been taken from such order by the company or corporation to the supreme court of this State, it shall immediately become the duty of the commission to remove such order, with the evidence adduced upon the hearing, with the documents in the case, to the supreme court of this State. Any company, corporation, or common carrier which does not comply with the order of the commission within the time limited therefor may file with the commission a petition to remove such cause to the supreme court, and in the event of such removal by the company, corporation, or common carrier or other party to such hearing, the supreme court may, upon application, in its discretion or of its own motion, require or authorize additional evidence to be taken in such cause, but in the event of removal by the commission, upon failure of the company, corporation, or common carrier, no additional evidence shall be allowed. The supreme court, for the consideration of such causes arising hereunder, shall be in session at all times and shall give precedence to such causes. Any party to such hearing before the commission shall have the same right to remove the order entered therein to the supreme court of the State as given under the provisions hereof to the company or corporation against which such order is directed.

In addition to the other powers vested in the supreme court by this constitution and the laws of the State, the said court shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to decide such cases on their merits and carry into effect its judgments, orders, and decrees made in such cases by fine, forfeiture, mandamus, injunction, and contempt or any other appropriate proceedings.

ARTICLE 19.—AMENDMENTS.

SECTION 1. Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature at any regular session thereof, and if two-thirds of all members elected to each of the two houses voting separately shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon; or any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed at the first regular session of the legislature held after the expiration of two years from the time this constitution goes into effect, or at the regular session of the legislature convening each eighth year thereafter, and if a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses voting separately at said sessions shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon. The secretary of state shall cause any such amendment or amendments to be published in at least one newspaper in every county of the State where a newspaper is published, once each week, for four consecutive weeks, the last publication to be not less than two weeks prior to the next general election, at which time the said amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the electors of the State for their approval or rejection.

If the same be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon and by an affirmative vote equal to at least 40 per cent of all the votes cast at said election in the State and in at least one-half of the counties thereof, then, and not otherwise, such amendment or amendments shall become part of this constitution. Not more than three amendments shall be submitted at one election, and if two or more amendments are proposed, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote on each of them separately; provided, that no amendment shall apply to or affect the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of article 7 hereof on elective franchise and sections 8 and 10 of article 12 hereof on education unless it be proposed by vote of three-fourths of the members elected to each house.

No cunning hand of skillful expert, hired by corporate power, ever drafted an instrument more calculated to hold the people of New Mexico in subjection to the demands and orders of its masters than is done by that instrument called its constitution. I regret that it is so, for I shall always have gratification in the prosperity, happiness, and renown of all citizens in this great Republic, it matters not what section they may claim as their home.

These remarkable features in the constitution of New Mexico suggest the inquiry, Wherein lies the genuine success of a State? It will be found in the possession of those qualities which constitute success in those who control and inhabit it. It is created by that moral grandeur of government which is evidenced by the diffusion of its blessings amongst all the people committed to its care, giving to them an equal opportunity for advancement in life unfettered by unjust and unwise laws. [Applause.]

No system of government where the wealth and emoluments of office and special privileges are conferred upon a few at the expense of the many can long exist. Such a system of government creates a multiplication of artificial desires and selfish wants on the part of those having those emoluments and privileges which tend to vice and luxury and the destruction of morality, virtue, and self-denial, without which no free republic can long exist. All history shows the truth of this statement. In Athens and Sparta a few held all the emoluments of office, substantially all the wealth, while the great mass of their brethren were held in servitude; hence liberty was short-lived in the Grecian commonwealths.

The same causes which destroyed the commonwealths of Greece brought about the downfall of the Italian Republics. In Genoa, Florence, Venice, and Pisa a few of the privileged class held all the wealth and emoluments of office, whilst the prosperity of the people was destroyed by mercantile monopoly.

On such a foundation can be built no structure for a free republic. Rome pursued a different policy. The rights of citizenship were granted to all her people alike, and her marvelous growth, vast dominion, and long duration of power attest the wisdom of her policy. The victories of Hannibal only urged her senate to greater exertions.

Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannae failed to shake the foundation of that mighty structure, which was cemented by the fidelity of all its people, and when Rome fell it was due to the evil of domestic slavery and the vices and luxury of its nobles, who were thereby made unfit to stem the tide of decay and decline of that mighty empire.

What constitutes the greatness of our Republic? Not alone its vast and unparalleled wealth; not its mines of gold and silver, of iron and copper; not the palaces of the rich and powerful which adorn and beautify our great cities; not its boundless western plains, where there is gathered food for the world's consumption; not the fields of the South white with cotton which is shipped to Japan, China, and Africa to clothe their people; not its mighty rivers nor its great lakes; not its favored climate, which attracts the traveler from every land and invites him to pleasure and repose; not its mountains in their grandeur and solemnity. Great and wonderful as are the material and natural resources of our country, its chief excellence will not be found in them, but it will be discovered in the Constitution of our common country and in its legal institutions, which give to every man the same advantages and opportunities for advancement in life. [Applause.] This is its chief excellence, the most radiant jewel in its crown of glory.

There is no citizen of this country who loves its prosperity and its renown who can fail to discern that the same causes which destroyed the republics of other days now threaten the institutions which protect him. The vast accumulation of money by a few at the expense of the many, the insatiate greed of corporate power, the insane desire for wealth to be used for personal advantage, all threaten the institutions of this country and foreshadow, if not checked, the commencement of the decline of this Republic whilst it is yet in its infancy and before its work has been accomplished. Against this specter of evil I place the manifest destiny of our great Republic and the fortitude of its people in the hour of peril and its disaster. Long may it survive, and may its greatness in the ages to come be recognized by the equal diffusion of its blessings amongst all its people, by its justice in dealing with weaker nationalities, by the good it has wrought, and by the happiness it has brought to all humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND].

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, under the terms of the pending resolution it is proposed to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union unconditionally. It is provided in the resolution that certain amendments shall be submitted to the people of each of these Territories respectively. The amendment to be submitted to the people of the Territory of Arizona provides that the judiciary shall not be subject to the operation of the recall as it now is in the proposed constitution. This amendment, however, is not mandatory, and it is possible, therefore, if the amendment be not agreed to by the people of Arizona, that that Territory may come into the Union with the recall of judges in its constitution. The question is, therefore, squarely presented to the Congress of the United States, and each one of us must go upon record as to whether or not we believe in the recall of judges as a principle. I do not propose to spend time in the discussion of the question of whether these respective constitutions are republican in form or not, for I hold it to be within our power, I hold it to be a necessary duty on our part, conceding that the form of the provisional constitutions may be republican, to go beyond the question of form and examine very carefully the question of substance.

There are many questions in these proposed constitutions which should receive our careful consideration, but I propose to address myself exclusively to that article in the constitution of Arizona which provides for the recall of judges.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, there can be no difference of opinion among us as to the soundness of three propositions. First, every citizen of this Republic is interested in obtaining and maintaining the highest standard in the judiciary of his own State as well as in every other State; second, every State in this Union is deeply interested in maintaining such standards within its own jurisdiction as well as in having them maintained within the jurisdiction of sister States; and third, the Federal Government is vitally interested in maintaining the highest standards in the Federal judiciary and in their maintenance in every one of the sovereign States of this Union. [Applause.]

We are asked in the pending resolution to give our consent to the admission into this Union of a State having in its proposed constitution a provision for the recall of judges on substantially 30 days' notice after six months of the elective term has elapsed, and we should inquire very carefully whether a provision of this character will have a tendency to raise or lower the standard of the judiciary. If it will raise the standard, it should be adopted; if it will lower the standard, it should not be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are experiencing in this country to-day a peculiar phenomenon which manifests itself on the part of some of our people in a hostile attitude toward the established order. Years ago a certain school of teachers laid down the proposition that "whatever is, is right." To-day the converse of that proposition seems to be true, and as we listen to the storm of criticism of the established order we are justified in saying that a certain school to-day stands for the proposition that "whatever is, is wrong." I give my support to neither one of these schools. I refuse to join with the fatalist, on the one hand, wedded to his idols; and neither will I join with the iconoclast, on the other, and tear down the temple. Between these two extremes we must choose the middle course, guiding our steps, if you please, by the lamp of experience and listening attentively to the teachings of the fathers. With these guides we must apply all the intelligence, all the judgment, all the wisdom that we can command in an attempt to solve present-day problems, firm in the determination to "prove all things and hold fast that which is good."

It is not strange, Mr. Chairman, that old things should appear new to the person who beholds them for the first time. This whole question of the judicial tenure is as old as civilization itself and was thrashed out in all its phases in the Athenian democracy, where the Archons were chosen for a year, and their chief duty was to call a jury, to which was submitted all questions of law and fact. Unlearned in the law, to be sure, but in that pure democracy each Athenian citizen was presumed to know as much as every other. Under such a system it was possible to condemn Socrates to death for teaching the youth of Athens his doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and to banish Aristides because he was known as the "Just." Under such conditions where life, liberty, and property were subject to the whim of the hour, the inevitable happened and the Government perished. The utter failure of democracy to provide an independent judiciary capable of protecting the rights of the individual drove the people to the other extreme of absolute monarchy, where the judges were appointed by the monarch and of course, subject to removal at his pleasure. In the history of the English people the glaring defects of this system early became apparent, for the judges were mere puppets of the King and were unable, and in many cases unwilling, to protect the individual against the encroachments of the Crown. This situation became intolerable to the English people and it was remedied by an act of Parliament which provided that judges should not be removed during good behavior, and that was the condition of affairs in England at the time of the adoption of our Constitution.

The framers of the Constitution were perfectly familiar with the complete failure of democracy on the one hand and monarchy on the other to provide an independent judiciary, and they realized that the rights of individuals could not be protected so long as the judiciary was subservient to or dependent on the executive arm of the Government, whether that executive arm was a pure democracy on the one hand or an absolute monarchy on the other. They therefore adopted the republican form of government, as distinguished from a democracy or a monarchy, hoping thereby to avoid the well-known dangers incident to each and to create a judicial system capable of protecting the rights of the individual even against the Government itself.

In view of the radical proposition contained in this constitution providing for a recall of judges, a proposition which gives a judge a legal title to his term for six months only and makes him a tenant at will for the balance of the elective term, I would inquire whether the history of the judiciary of our country lays a foundation for or argues the necessity of such a change, which renders uncertain and indefinite the judicial tenure.

I make bold to assert that it does not, but on the contrary argues in most eloquent and convincing language in favor of a stable tenure of office for the judiciary. The judges of our country, from the foundation of our Government to the present time; from the nisi prius judges of the various States to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, almost with no exception, have been men of the highest integrity, noble character, courageous, and incorruptible; and even to-day, when criticism is so rampant, few there are who even whisper that the decisions of our courts are governed by ulterior motives.

Mr. Chairman, I lay it down as a fundamental proposition that a judge in the administration of justice must be absolutely independent of the power that creates him. Otherwise, whenever the interest of that power is involved in litigation before that court, you have no judge. There are those who contend that the judge should not be independent of the power that creates him, but should be responsive to the will of the majority that elects him.

If that means that the judge should be responsive to the will of the majority that elects him as that will is expressed and crystallized in the organic and statute law, then it is an accurate and correct statement; but if it means, and I fear it does in some instances, that the judge must be responsive to the will of the majority which elects him as that will is expressed in party platforms, in the town meeting, or on the street, then it is utterly antagonistic to any rational conception of law and order and enforces the whim of the hour instead of the deliberate judgment of the people as expressed and recorded through their duly established institutions. [Applause.]

Judges are elected by majorities or selected by the people through an intermediate appointing power. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, the majority which elected the judge, or the appointing power, wished him to hand down a decision contrary to law, and in compliance with that wish he did so. Under those circumstances there is no judge. The contention that the judge should be responsive to the whim of the hour and voice it in judicial decree is more dangerous and more destructive to American institutions than that of the red-shirted anarchist, who, animated with a fiendish desire to destroy the established order, hurls the bomb.

The judge knows no constituents, knows no party, knows no friends, and knows no enemies; and if every member of the electorate, save one, that placed the judicial ermine on his shoulders should be present in the court room demanding that he turn over to them the life or property of the remaining one of his constituents contrary to law, he must refuse to do so or he is not a judge. If all the wealth of his district is on one side of the trial table without justice and equity and a pauper on the other with justice and equity, he must decide for the pauper or there is no judge.

We create judges and clothe them with power, to do what? To pass judgment upon us—each and every one of us—to interpret and to decree the enforcement of the law which we have made and which we can change at will. If we who create the judge and clothe him with power insist that he is our creature, to decree our will, regardless of the law, we have placed a phonograph on the bench, but not a judge. [Applause.] To do this is to attach such subservient and humiliating conditions to the judicial office that no broad-minded, self-respecting man could possibly consent to them. In this connection, Mr. Chairman—and I know it is not in vogue in these days to pay much attention to the teachings of wise men of bygone ages, because this generation has become sufficient unto itself and knows more than all the generations that have preceded us—I propose to read, without making any apology, a short quotation from Alexander Hamilton in No. 78 of the Federalist, as follows:

> The independence of the judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill humors which the arts of designing men or the influence of particular conjunctures sometimes disseminate among the people themselves, and which, though they speedily give place to better information and more deliberate reflection, have a tendency in the meantime to occasion dangerous innovations in the Government and serious oppressions of the minor party in the community.

Hamilton is here arguing against the elective system and in favor of the appointive system during good behavior, but the argument is in favor of an independent, stable judiciary, and is in point in the present discussion.

And with the indulgence of the House I propose to read also in this connection a quotation from the speech of Mr. Justice Marshall in the constitutional convention of the State of Virginia in 1829. Mr. Justice Marshall said, among other things, the following:

> The argument of the gentleman goes to prove not only that there is no such thing as judicial independence, but that there ought to be no such thing; that it is unwise and improvident to make the tenure of the judge's office to continue during good behavior. Advert, sir, to the duties of a judge. He has to pass between the Government and the man whom that Governmest is prosecuting—between the most powerful individual in the community and the poorest and most unpopular. It is of the last importance that in the performance of these duties he should observe the utmost fairness. Need I press the necessity of this? Does not every man feel that his own personal security and the security of his property depend upon that fairness? The judicial department comes home in its effects to every man's fireside; it passes on his property, his reputation, his life, his all. Is it not to the last degree important that he should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to control him but God and his conscience? * * * I acknowledge that, in my judgment, the whole good which may grow out of this convention, be it what it may, will never compensate for the evil of changing the judicial tenure of office. * * * I have always thought from my earliest youth till now that the greatest scourge an angry Heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent judiciary.

Mr. Chairman, as I read these words from the great Chief Justice I can almost imagine that he is present in person speaking against the recall of judges, so squarely does he hit the present case. We all know that if the power had existed John Marshall would have been recalled. Yet to-day, with one accord, we are glad to pay him homage as the great expounder of the Constitution.

Sir, when I read the history of my country I am proud of the heroic men who have maintained the national honor on the land and on the sea. I give my unbounded admiration to the great lawgivers of our people, but I am imbued with a sense of the deepest gratitude when I contemplate the results which have been accomplished by an independent judiciary. [Applause.] We might adopt a new Constitution every other day, guaranteeing in the strongest language life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, and philosophizing on the rights of man, but if those guaranties are not enforced by judicial decree, we have not added one iota to the rights of man or promoted in the slightest degree the liberties of the people. "Oh," but the demagogue cries, "you are afraid to trust the people to choose their own judges," thereby hoping to win their confidence and gain advantage for himself. This is the same charge that was hurled at Rufus Choate in the constitutional convention in Massachusetts in 1853, and in replying to that charge, and in further replying to the charge that a stable tenure of office was unrepublican, he used the following language:

> It seems to me that such an argument forgets that our political system, while it is purely and intensely republican, within all theories aims to accomplish a twofold object, to wit, liberty and security. To accomplish this twofold object we have established a twofold set of institutions and instrumentalities—some of them designed to develop and give utterance to one; some of them designed to provide permanently and constantly for the other; some of them designed to bring out the popular will in its utmost intensity of utterance; some of them designed to secure life and liberty and character and happiness and property and equal and exact justice against all will and against all power.

Then again, on page 309, he says:

You assign to Liberty her place, her stage, her emotions, her ceremonies. You assign to Law and Justice theirs. The stage, the emotions, the visible presence of Liberty are in the mass meeting, the procession by torch light, at the polls, in the halls of legislation, in the voices of the press, in the freedom of political speech, in the energy, intelligence, and hope which pervade the mass; in the silent unreturning tide of progression. But there is another apartment, smaller, humbler, more quiet, down in the basement story of our Capitol, appropriated to justice, to security, to reason, to restraint, where there is no respect of persons; where there is no high nor low, no strong nor weak; where will is nothing and power is nothing, and numbers are nothing, and all are equal, and all secure before the law.

Mr. Chairman, I entertain no doubt, sir, of the ability of the people of Arizona to select their own judges. I insist that they shall do it, but for a definite fixed period; that period to be determined by themselves. But when they have selected their judges, I insist that they shall be free and untrammeled in the administration of justice during their term of office, subject only to impeachment for malfeasance in office. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This very proposition for a recall of judges—just analyze it for a moment—this very proposition for a recall of judges after six months of the elective term have expired carries with it, by implication and of necessity, the most flagrant distrust of the ability of the people of Arizona to select competent judges for their superior and supreme courts for the limited periods of four and six years, respectively. I therefore charge, Mr. Chairman, that those who are advocating the recall are the ones who are afraid to trust the people to select competent judges, and I insist that it is an insult to the intelligence of the people of Arizona and a reflection on their ability to select competent judges for stated periods.

Oh, but you say, "The people might make a mistake in the selection of a judge, and, in that event, there ought to be machinery provided to give relief and cover that particular case." I am forced to admit that possibly now and then the people might make a mistake in the selection of a judge. But this contingency in this proposed constitution is very carefully provided for in two ways. In the first place, the supreme court is clothed with the broadest appellate jurisdiction, for it is expressly provided that no reversal shall be had for any technical error; and, in the second place, in article 8, the very article that provides for this recall, provision is made for the impeachment by the legislature of a judge for crimes, misdemeanors, and malfeasance in office. The proposed constitution has provided very carefully for the case of malfeasance in office, and the penalty is removal from office and disqualification to hold office in the future. The proposed constitution has very carefully provided for the correction of errors and mistrials in the lower court on appeal. The corrupt judge can be impeached. The mediocre judge can be reversed.

It is perfectly apparent that the recall is inserted in this constitution in order to reach the case of the unpopular judge, to reach a case of dissatisfaction and unpopularity that may for any reason be prevalent in the community. So it is provided, so it is made possible, that whenever an unpopular decision is handed down by the judge a petition may be filed, signed by 25 per cent of the electorate, and bring on an election within 30 days after the filing of the petition. Judges are elected by a majority. Most of the elective offices are filled without the successful candidate receiving 75 per cent of the total vote. The vote of the opposition will always as a rule amount to more than 25 per cent of the total vote, and how easy it would be for a disappointed litigant, an unsuccessful candidate, or an ambitious rival to secure a petition signed by 25 per cent of the electorate and bring on an election for a recall! It is perfectly apparent, Mr. Chairman, that this provision for the recall is inserted in this constitution for the very purpose of rendering the judge amenable to the temporary public sentiment in his district and controlling his decrees in accordance with that temporary public sentiment, regardless of the established law.

The point is this: Under the recall a special election might be had, a special election will be had, when feeling in the community is intense, when excitement runs high, when passions are inflamed, and when, possibly, only the judge and the law stand between the individual and vengeance. I insist, sir, that the power shall never be granted to call a special election at such a time as that. [Applause.] I insist that judges shall be elected at regular intervals, for definite periods, fixed by law and known beforehand of all men, when, as a rule, with excitement over, passion subsided, and reason enthroned in the community, the people can register their calm, deliberate judgment, and from that judgment in this country there can, and ought to be, no appeal.

Mr. Chairman, the fact that such a provision for the recall of judges is contained in the proposed constitution of a Territory knocking at our doors for admission into this Union; the fact, sir, that such heresies are entertained in other and, perhaps, more influential quarters, arouses in my mind the gravest doubts as to the future. Against this proposition, with all the energy that I can command, I enter my most emphatic protest.

In my judgment it is fundamentally wrong. It is dangerous to and destructive of American institutions. It is contrary to the experience of our people for more than a century. It is contrary to the teachings of the fathers who, amid storm and stress, framed the fabric of this Government; framed it, sir, with the avowed purpose of escaping the well-known dangers of a turbulent and unrestrained democracy on the one hand and monarchy and its tyrannies on the other. [Applause.]

I refuse, sir, to lay profane hands on the temple of justice that has sheltered and protected us throughout our national life, and I shall vote against the pending resolution for these reasons. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOUSTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 339. An act providing for the reappraisement and sale of certain lands in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and for other purposes.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield one hour and a half to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, it is with sincere regret that I feel compelled to vote against the admission of Arizona as a State into the Federal Union under the terms of the proposed constitution which has been submitted to the President and the Congress of the United States for ratification and approval.

I have been a consistent friend of the Territory of Arizona ever since I have been a Member of this House. I believe Arizona has a glorious future. I have been anxious to see her represented by a bright star in the brilliant galaxy that is the crowning glory of the starry banner of this great Nation. But I do not believe that under the proposed constitution, which has been adopted by about 12,000 of her people out of a voting population of over 37,000, and which recently has been submitted to us for ratification and approval, she can reach that splendid destiny which every one of her true friends hopes to see her attain.

In my opinion Arizona is the one section of the Union in which there should be no doubt as to the advantages of representative government; for she herself has reaped the benefit and reward of representative government. Beyond question it is due solely to the efforts of representatives of republican government that she is able, at this time, even to offer a constitution, which, if it should be approved, will give her individual autonomy as a State in the Union.

It will be recalled by those who are familiar with the comparatively recent history of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico that a determined effort was made, in the Fifty-ninth Congress, to unite them and admit them as one State in the Federal Union.

The then President of the United States strongly recommended their union and their admission as one State. He brought all the powerful influence of his great office to bear upon many of the representatives of the people to cause them to enact the necessary legislation that should consummate this unholy alliance. But despite this powerful influence, which was exerted by one of the most popular Presidents that ever occupied the White House, despite the great pressure that was brought to bear upon the Members on this floor and on the floor of the coordinate branch of the legislative body of this Government, there were representatives of the people who still had the courage and the fortitude to withstand that pressure, and who, by their firmness in the cause of a square deal for Arizona, succeeded, ultimately, in preventing the passage of that legislation. Do the people of Arizona doubt that if the matter had been submitted by initiative or referendum to the votes of the people of the United States that the great majority of the votes would have favored the amalgamation of the two Territories as one State?

If we had had a national initiative and referendum law at that time, the proponents of the one-State idea, in my humble judgment, undoubtedly would have been able by the means of the initiative or the referendum to have carried out their plans to consolidate these two great Territories as one State. So far as a national initiative or referendum vote could have decided the matter, the people of Arizona would have found themselves in a hopeless minority. But our present system of government recognizes the rights of minorities in the enactment of laws as the initiative or referendum never can.

In those populous sections of our country where the great masses of votes are to be found the sentiment was strongly in favor of such a union. Arguments were made upon this floor that it was unfair to the populous States, with their great and diversified interests, to give each one of these Territories, when admitted as a State, an equal representation in the United States Senate with the more populous Commonwealths. Did the people of Arizona find that the representatives of the people of many of the States of the Union proved recreant to their trusts? Did the people of Arizona find that, in having adopted means to prevent their union with New Mexico, representative government was a failure, and that new and unusual methods ought to be employed to compel the representatives of the people to do their duty? Why, sir, in the light of these events, in the light of these experiences, which must have demonstrated the fact that under existing laws the rights of minorities in legislation are much more thoroughly safeguarded than under the initiative and referendum, one is all the more surprised to find that the constitutional convention of Arizona insisted on inserting these unusual and experimental provisions in the proposed organic law of the proposed State.

Mr. Chairman, there is a disposition among some of our public officials, aided and abetted by a certain class of theorists in government, to materially change the character of our Government.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. When I have finished my direct address I will be very glad indeed to reply to any questions that may be asked me, but just now I prefer not to be interrupted.

To my mind they are treading on dangerous ground. Our country is too vast in extent for a pure democracy. Most of the States in the Union are too vast in extent for a pure democracy. Prof. Garner, in his work, "Introduction to Political Science," differentiates a pure democracy, such as the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, would lead to, and a representative democracy, which is the republican form of Government contemplated by the Constitution of our country, in this language:

> Democracies are of two kinds—pure, or direct, and representative, or indirect. A pure democracy is one in which the will of the state is formulated and expressed directly and immediately through the people acting in their primary capacity. A representative democracy is one in which the state will is ascertained and expressed through the agency of a small and select number, who act as the representatives of the people. A pure democracy is practicable only in small states, where the voting population may be assembled for purposes of legislation and where the collective needs of the people are few and simple. In large and complex societies, where the legislative wants of the people are numerous, the very necessities of the situation make government by the whole body of citizens a physical impossibility.

And the distinguished author approves the distinction drawn between the two forms of government, as enunciated by Madison, as follows:

> It was, he said, a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their office during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior. "The two great points of difference," said Madison, "between a republic and a democracy are: First, the governing power in a republic is delegated to a small number of citizens elected by the rest; and, second, a republic is capable of embracing a larger population and of extending over a wider area of territory than is a democracy. In a democracy the people meet and exercise the government in person; in a republic they assemble and administer it by their representative agents."

The question as to whether this country of ours should be a pure democracy or a representative democracy was fully considered at the time of the formation of our Government. The framers of the Constitution were men who were thoroughly versed in the principles of government. They were familiar with the history of every government that had ever existed since the dawn of recorded time. They remembered that the pure democracies of ancient Greece had had their rise, their zenith, and their decay. The difference between a pure democracy and a representative republic was plainly pointed out by Hamilton, Madison, Marshall, Randolph, Rutledge, Wilson, Mason, and other distinguished patriots of the period immediately succeeding the American Revolution. It was pointed out by these men, who were all skilled in statecraft, that the ancient democracies had fallen by reason of the turbulence and passion that were so often manifested among the masses; they pointed out the fact that in the great market places it was impossible to debate proposed laws as they should have been debated; they pointed out the despotism of majorities, and the danger of the ultimate debauchery of the masses. In differentiating republics from pure democracies Hamilton, in "The Federalist," said:

> The difference most relied upon between the American and other republics consists in the principle of representation; which is the pivot on which the former moves, and which is supposed to be unknown to the latter, or, at least, to the ancient part of them.

Gerry, in discussing the form of government that should be adopted by the Constitutional Convention of 1787, made a powerful argument in favor of a representative democracy as against a pure democracy. He feared the pretended patriot more than he did the people. He said:

> The evils we experience flow from the excess of democracy. The people do not want (lack) virtue, but are the dupes of pretended patriots.

And Jefferson said:

> Modern times have * * * discovered the only device by which the (equal) rights (of man) can be secured, to wit: Government by the people, acting not in person, but by representatives chosen by themselves.

So that when the founders of our Republic adopted the Federal Constitution they purposely tried to get away from pure democracy; and, so far as they were able to form a republican government, they accomplished their task exceedingly well. It is also a matter of the political history of our country that the party of which Jefferson became the undoubted leader did not attempt to call itself the Democratic Party.

It was designated the Republican Party. It continued under that designation during the entire life of Thomas Jefferson, and that designation was never changed until after his death in 1826. Under this republican form of government our country has advanced and developed and prospered as no other country in the world's history. The Constitution, as had been predicted, was able to expand to meet new conditions as they arose without the necessity of frequent or serious amendment. As measures were presented to the representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States for their consideration these measures were thoroughly discussed, and oftentimes they were materially amended before they were finally enacted into law. It was soon found that in a large country like ours, with many conflicting interests and diversified industries, it would be necessary to compromise differences in order that the proposed law might meet the conflicting demands of the different sections, and this spirit of compromise has generally proved efficacious in accomplishing the desired results. By these compromises the rights of minorities invariably have been respected. Practically our whole history is a history of compromise legislation, and as a rule the people have been content with the legislation that has been enacted. And when they have not been content, they have not hesitated to manifest their displeasure by defeating the majority, thus making the minority a majority, with all the responsibilities that accompany majority rule.

It is true that at times men have been elected to office who were unworthy of the confidence that the people had reposed in them, but does that show that the system of representative government is at fault? Does it not rather prove that the people themselves were to blame for having elected inefficient or corrupt officials?

It is a matter of record in our country's history that whenever the people have made mistakes they have not hesitated to rectify them at the earliest possible opportunity. Up to the present time they have been able, invariably, to mend their faults of yesterday with wisdom of to-day, under our Constitution and our laws as they have stood, lo, these many years.

But it is charged by those who so strongly favor the initiative, the referendum, and the recall that the opponents of these methods of legislation and election of public officials are "afraid of the people." As a matter of fact, the shoe is on the other foot. Those who favor the recall in effect convict the people of being incompetent in the selection of their officials. It seems to me that it is they who are "afraid of the people." They contend that the people go to the polls and make such egregious mistakes in the election of officials that a minority of the voting population ought to be given an opportunity to attempt to correct the blunders of the majority by recalling the official who has fallen under the displeasure of that minority. The logical effect of their reasoning is to admit that the people are incompetent to elect able or honest officers. And yet these same advocates of these new "nostrums" in a republican form of government expect the same people, who have failed in their efforts to elect the right kind of officeholders, to go to the polls under the doctrine of the initiative and the referendum and adopt, perhaps, a comprehensive system of new laws, such as only a Supreme Court would be able to interpret.

It shows the inconsistency of these self-styled "friends of the people," for they practically admit in one breath that the people are incompetent to elect the right kind of public officials and in the next breath they want to clothe the same people with a still more arduous duty, namely, the duty of adopting, by ballot, and without the power of amendment, some intricate proposition of law, the adoption of which might have the most far-reaching results, for good or for evil, on the future of the entire community.

Sir, the people of this country have always shown their capacity for self-government under the existing methods, and I apprehend that they will continue to govern themselves admirably under existing methods without resorting to those that may be considered as experimental and unrepublican.

Mr. Chairman, at one time I was rather inclined to the belief that the initiative, the referendum, and the recall would prove the panacea for all our political ailments. Initiative, referendum, recall! It certainly sounds good, and in theory it looks just as good as it sounds. But the more I have studied the subject the more thoroughly I have become convinced that they would ultimately be found dangerous experiments in the field of representative government, and that, as a matter of fact, they are entirely unnecessary. Our existing constitutions and laws, with such occasional changes, additions, and corrections as the legislative branches of our national, State, or municipal governments might find it necessary to enact from time to time, will probably meet every emergency as it arises. We have abundant evidence that such is the case.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to his colleague?

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield. If I have any time after I have finished my speech, I shall be glad to answer questions, but at present I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KAHN. And so long as we continue along the safe lines that we have been following for over a century the danger of becoming a law-ridden people, with laws, laws, laws to regulate the every action of every individual resident of this great country, will be materially kept in check. We are in danger of having too much law, and too much law will lead eventually to contempt for all law. [Applause.]

I think it may be asserted as an axiom that every community, whether it be a municipality or a State, gets just such an administration as its people are willing to stand for, no better and no worse. All students of American history agree that the weak spot of our system is our form of municipal government. And yet it has been demonstrated time and again that whenever conditions have become intolerable, whenever graft and corruption have become a stench in the public nostrils, whenever the public conscience has really become thoroughly aroused, the people—without the aid of initiative, referendum, or recall—have been able to drive the thieves from office and put honest men in their places. [Applause.] Dozens of our cities have demonstrated the undoubted ability of their citizens to purge their communities of corruption whenever the voters wanted to assert themselves. But unfortunately, in most instances the spasms of virtue and righteous indignation have been rather short-lived. I have often wondered why the people who have the strength and the capacity to drive out public plunderers whenever they want to assert themselves, all too frequently allow the political bosses to resume control within a comparatively brief space of years after the reform movement has triumphed over the corruptionists.

In giving the subject some thought I have come to the conclusion that the swinging back of the pendulum in so many instances is due to the fact that the reformers, instead of adopting a liberal policy in construing and enforcing the laws, invariably go to the other extreme and enforce all ordinances—especially such as may be considered in the nature of sumptuary laws—with such harshness and severity that the average citizen begins to rebel at a condition that he considers intolerable, and losing all interest in the general welfare of his community, he allows either the old boss, or perchance a new one, to take possession again of the local administrations. For a little time the reinstated boss, or his successor, as the case may be, slowly and carefully feels his way along, but ultimately the old conditions again prevail. It is unfortunate that such conditions should exist. But it is utterly impossible to change human nature by man-made law, for human nature has been the same in all ages. We are familiar with the story of how in ancient Athens it was proposed to take a referendum as to whether Aristides, called "The Just," should be banished or not. He had been an excellent administrator. He had won the confidence of his people, but he had made some powerful enemies. Going into the market place, he was met by a citizen who asked him to write his (the citizen's) ballot for the banishment of Aristides. The latter asked the Anthenian citizen what objection he had to Aristides. "Oh, none," said the citizen, "but I am tired of hearing him called 'The Just.'" One can never tell what motive will actuate the citizen in the course he may pursue. However, the point I want to emphasize is this, namely, that it rests within the power of the citizens of every municipality to have a good, clean, orderly, honest, and efficient administration of its own affairs if the people of that municipality want such an administration, and that the old republican form of government is ample to guarantee such an administration without the necessity of having to resort to the unusual expediency of the initiative, referendum, and recall.

And what is true of the municipality in this regard is equally true of the State. Take my own State—the State of California—as an instance. Last November the people went to the ballot box and elected a complete set of State officials, as well as Members of Congress and members of the State legislature. The course of the legislature that was elected at that time has been generally commended. The various officials of the State government that were elected at that time have likewise been commended. And, as a matter of fact, all these results were accomplished under our existing constitution and laws, without invoking initiative, referendum, or recall. If, therefore, the existing laws of a State can be enforced so as to satisfy the citizens of that State, why should the voters of that State resort to experiments of a new and doubtful nature—experiments that have only had a trial in a few communities and that have never been invoked in any of the populous and progressive Commonwealths of our country?

Mr. Chairman, as a matter of historic interest it may be well to note at this time that the downfall of the first and second French Republics was accomplished through the medium of the referendum.

Napoleon Bonaparte was elected Consul for life in 1802 through a plebiscite or referendum submitted to the people of France in this form: "Shall Napoleon Bonaparte be Consul for life?" Three and one-half million votes were cast in the affirmative and only a few thousand in the negative. That vote really marked the beginning of the Empire under Napoleon the First.

Later on, during the period of the second Republic, which had been inaugurated in 1848, the nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte, Louis Napoleon, in 1852 was elected Emperor of France through the medium of another plebiscite or referendum submitted to the voters of that country. At this election more than 7,000,000 citizens voted in favor of the proposition, with only a few thousand in the negative.

And, Mr. Chairman, it is a noticeable fact in both instances that immediately before the submission of these plebiscites or referenda to the people of France such of their representatives in the Senate or in the Legislative Assembly who could have been relied upon to denounce and thwart the conspirators who sought the ruin of the Republic were summarily arrested and exiled before the plebiscites were submitted.

I merely mention these historic instances to emphasize the fact that the people themselves are just as prone to make mistakes and fall into error as are their chosen representatives.

Mr. Chairman, what is the history of the initiative and referendum? They were first brought to light in the little Republic of Switzerland about the year 1850. During all the years that have intervened since then they have been invoked there but a few times. The Swiss people are a pastoral people. They do not have the many or the diversified industries that are found in this great Republic of ours. Indeed, one could place the entire Republic of Switzerland in some one of the counties of some of our Western States and still have room to spare. It approximates in size more nearly the old Grecian democracies, in which the people were wont to gather in the market places and there publicly discuss matters of legislation and the election of officials. But in most of our States, with their extensive areas, their populous cities and metropolitan districts, in my judgment, these Swiss importations are absolutely impracticable.

But there are many students of the system who have declared that even in Switzerland, the original home of the initiative and the referendum, those innovations have not worked as satisfactorily as the friends of these experiments in popular government anticipated. Mr. Albert Bushnell Hart, who is conceded to be a moderate and an impartial observer and critic, in his article, "Vox Populi in Switzerland," says:

I must own to disappointment over the use made by the Swiss of their envied opportunity. On the 20 referenda between 1879 and 1891 the average vote in proportion to the voters was but 58.5 per cent; in only one case did it reach 67 per cent; and in one case, the patent law of 1887, it fell to about 40 per cent in the Confederation and to 9 per cent in the Canton Schwyz. On the serious and dangerous question of recognizing the right to employment * * * only 56 per cent participated.

* * * The result of the small vote is that laws duly considered by the national legislature and passed by considerable majorities are often reversed by a minority of the voters. The most probable reason for this apathy is that there are too many elections * * *. Whatever the cause, Swiss voters are less interested in referenda than Swiss legislators in framing bills.

And Mr. Simon Deploige, a Belgian critic, in his "The Referendum in Switzerland" (Trevelyan's translation), says of the conditions that prevail in the Alpine Republic:

It is a little ridiculous to talk of legislation by the people when more than one-half of the citizens refuse to exercise their legislative rights.

Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, in an article entitled "The Referendum in Switzerland and in America," makes this criticism:

The relation of the executive and legislative in Switzerland are very different from what they are in this country, for a great deal of what we should consider legislation falls into the province of the Swiss executive. The laws are passed in a comparatively simple and general form, and the executive has authority to complete their details and provide for their application by means of decrees and ordinances. Partly for this reason and partly on account of the small size of the country the number of laws passed in a year is far less than with us.

In the same article, Mr. Lowell draws an important, as well as an interesting, distinction between constitutional amendments and legislative enactments, and clearly points out the danger of lessening the high regard in which the fundamental principles are held in the estimation of the people. He says:

Our whole political system rests on the distinction between constitutional and other laws. The former are the solemn principles laid down by the people in its ultimate sovereignty; the latter are regulations made by its representatives within the limits of their authority, and the courts can hold unauthorized and void any act which exceeds those limits. The courts can do this because they are maintaining against the legislature the fundamental principles which the people themselves have determined to support, and they can do it only so long as the people feel that the Constitution is something more sacred and enduring than ordinary laws; something that derives its force from a higher authority. Now, if all laws received their sanction from a direct popular vote, this distinction would disappear. There would cease to be any reason for considering one law more sacred than another, and hence our courts would soon lose their power to pass upon the constitutionality of statutes.

Dr. Woodrow Wilson, in his able work "The State," draws a similar conclusion.

In criticizing the tendency to adopt nonconstitutional provisions in our constitutions, he says:

The objections to the practice are as obvious as they are weighty. General outlines of organization, such as the Constitution of the United States contains, may be made to stand without essential alteration for long periods together; but in proportion, as constitutions make provisions for interests whose aspects must change from time to time with changing circumstances, they enter the domain of such law as must be subject to constant modification and adaptation. Not only must the distinctions between constitutional and ordinary law, hitherto recognized and valued, tend to be fatally obscured, but the much-to-be-desired stability of constitutional provisions must in great part be sacrificed. Those constitutions which contain the largest amount of extraneous matter, which does not concern at all the structure or functions of government, but only private or particular interests, must, of course, however carefully drawn, prove subject to most frequent change. In some of our States, accordingly, constitutions have been as often changed as important statutes. The danger is that constitution making will become with us only a cumbrous mode of legislation.

In this very connection it may be well to call attention to the fact that the people of the United States hold the Constitution of the United States in the very highest reverence. "It is the palladium of our liberties" has been a favorite expression in the discussion of the force and the power of the organic law of the land. Mr. Bryce, in his "The American Commonwealth," has admirably described the sentiment of the American people regarding their Constitution. He says:

The Federal Constitution is to their eyes an almost sacred thing, an Ark of the Covenant, whereon no man may lay rash hands.

I believe this characterization is universally conceded to be correct. Sir, the Constitution ought to be maintained "an almost sacred thing." To be able to amend it frequently and easily by the popular vote of the people would soon destroy that spirit of reverence in which it is now held.

And it is even so with the constitutions of the various States. They ought not to be subject to change with the ease that regulations made by the legislatures, within the limits of their authority, may be changed by subsequent amendment if they require amendment, or absolute repeal where they prove ineffective or even detrimental to the public welfare.

To diminish the powerful influence of the Constitution by subjecting it to easy change through the medium of the initiative is, to my mind at least, a serious blow to the love of law and order so prevalent in our Republic; and law and order are the surest safeguards of our liberties. Sir, republican governments owe their very existence to that love of law and order that prompts every patriotic impulse of the individuals who compose the State. It seems to me that to make it comparatively easy to change the organic law of the States by such dubious devices as the initiative and the referendum is really a defiance of all the teachings of history. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, as between the initiative and the referendum, I think the former is much the more dangerous of the two. Under existing methods the legislature passes upon measures as they are reported from its committees. There is generally a full and free discussion of the merits or demerits of the proposition that is under consideration, and when it is finally passed by the legislature it is, as a rule, a well-digested, completed piece of legislation. On the other hand, the initiative does not give any opportunity for discussion or amendment whatever.

The proposed measure must be adopted in its entirety as it comes from its proposers without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." The legislature must pass it just as it was framed by the author. The governor has no right to veto it as he may the measures that are passed by the legislature. Under the initiative, the fundamental principles of republican government can be set aside and new and unusual ones can be adopted without much debate and without full knowledge of the great change that might be contemplated under the provisions of the proposed new legislation. Therein lies its great danger. Thus "a successful faction may erect a tyranny on the ruins of law and order." [Applause.] Under the initiative or direct legislation the minority is overwhelmed by sheer force of numbers. In our legislatures the minority has an opportunity to discuss and modify the legislation proposed by the majority. I believe that the initiative strikes at the very vitals of republican government. It means the absolute tyranny of the majority—and all history teaches us that no tyranny is worse than that of majorities drunk with power.

The proponents of the initiative and referendum point with pride to the fact that they have worked successfully in a number of the cities of the country. It may be that in some cities they have worked successfully, but there is a vast difference between the affairs of a city and the affairs of a whole State. The State, just like the Union, has many diversified industries and many conflicting interests. What may work excellently for one section of the State may spell ruination for another section. Under the initiative the rights of minorities in legislation can be completely ignored. And all true statesmen recognize the fact that minorities have certain rights which majorities are in duty bound to respect.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I am free to admit that, to my mind, it is an exceedingly hazardous experiment to attempt legislation for a great Commonwealth through the experimental expediency of the initiative and referendum.

But the feature of the Arizona constitution that is most repugnant, in my judgment, is the recall. Let me submit the provision as embodied in the proposed constitution of Arizona to this House:

ARTICLE VIII.—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

1. RECALL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

SECTION 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona, holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the number of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.

SEC. 2. Every recall petition must contain a general statement, in not more than 200 words, of the grounds of such demand, and must be filed in the office in which petitions for nominations to the office held by the incumbent are required to be filed. The signatures to such recall petition need not all be on one sheet of paper, but each signer must add to his signature the date of his signing said petition, and his place of residence, giving his street and number, if any, should he reside in a town or city. One of the signers of each sheet of such petition, or the person circulating such sheet, must make and subscribe an oath on said sheet that the signatures thereon are genuine.

SEC. 3. If said officer shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted, and the vacancy shall be filled as may be provided by law. If he shall not resign within five days after a recall petition is filed, a special election shall be ordered to be held not less than 20 nor more than 30 days after such order to determine whether such officer shall be recalled. On the ballots at said election shall be printed the reasons as set forth in the petition for demanding his recall, and, in not more than 200 words, the officer's justification of his course in office. He shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of said election shall have been officially declared.

SEC. 4. Unless he otherwise request, in writing, his name shall be placed as a candidate on the official ballot without nomination. Other candidates for the office may be nominated to be voted for at said election. The candidate who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared elected for the remainder of the term. Unless the incumbent receive the highest number of votes he shall be deemed to be removed from office upon qualification of his successor. In the event that his successor shall not qualify within five days after the result of said election shall have been declared, the said office shall be vacant and may be filled as provided by law.

SEC. 5. No recall petition shall be circulated against any officer until he shall have held his office for a period of six months, except that it may be filed against a member of the legislature at any time after five days from the beginning of the first session after his election. After one recall petition and election no further recall petition shall be filed against the same officer during the term for which he was elected unless petitioners signing such petition shall first pay into the public treasury which has paid such election expenses, all expenses of the preceding election.

SEC. 6. The general election laws shall apply to recall elections in so far as applicable. Laws necessary to facilitate the operation of the provisions of this article shall be enacted, including provision for payment by the public treasury of the reasonable special-election campaign expenses of such officer.

Under this Article VIII, subdivision 1, sections 1 to 6, inclusive, every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office; and such electoral district may include the whole State. These provisions are so broad that they include even the judiciary of the State within their scope. To my mind the provision stands for little short of anarchy. It means the turning over of the judiciary to the agitator and the mob. The history of our country is replete with instances where the courts have handed down decisions that were unpopular at the time they were rendered, but those decisions were in accordance with the Constitution and the laws of the land as construed by the judges who rendered the decision. To have recalled the judges who rendered them would have meant the triumph of mob rule over representative government. Our entire system of jurisprudence rests upon our constitutions, our treaties, our codes, the common law, statutes of the legislature, and precedents established by the courts. In construing laws the courts are governed by all of these instrumentalities. The judges render their decisions in accordance with their construction of these various instrumentalities, as applied to the case at bar. The judges, being human, may sometimes err, but there is usually an appeal to a higher tribunal, and, as a general proposition, the law when finally construed is promptly accepted by the people as the rule of action for all individuals affected by the decision. But what must happen in any community where the judge, when he decides the case according to the law as he construes it, if that construction be unpopular, must be divested of the ermine, must be pulled down from his seat upon the bench?

If that condition is to prevail in the new State of Arizona, or in any State of this Union, the constitution of that State, the codes of that State, all law textbooks, and the law colleges of that State should all be entirely abolished. They would be entirely superfluous and unnecessary. The judge must decide the case according to the popular demand or else he must be recalled from his position. It is unthinkable that any such condition can be allowed to prevail in this country. It would inevitably lead to anarchy and to the destruction of all government. [Applause.] High-minded lawyers would no longer seek a seat upon the bench. In fact, it would not be at all necessary to have a lawyer on the bench. Anybody would do just as well if decisions are to be rendered in accordance with the passing fancy of the multitude, rather than in accordance with the organic law and legislative acts of the State.

Mr. Cooley, in his work on "Constitutional Limitations," discussing the power of the people to amend or revise their constitution, says that it—is limited by the Constitution of the United States.

(1) It must not abolish the representative form of government, since such act would be revolutionary in its character, and would call for and demand direct intervention on the part of the Government of the United States.

(2) It must not provide for titles of nobility, or assume to violate the obligation of any contract, or attaint persons of crime, or provide ex post facto for the punishment of acts by the courts which were innocent when committed, or contain any other provision which would, in effect, amount to the exercise of any power expressly or impliedly prohibited to the States by the Constitution of the Union; for while such provision would not call for the direct and forcible intervention of the Government of the Union, it would be the duty of the courts, both State and national, to refuse to enforce them and to declare them altogether void, as much when enacted by the people in their primary capacity as makers of the fundamental law as when enacted in the form of statutes through the delegated power of their legislatures.

If this be the true limitation on the power of the people to amend or revise their constitutions as contemplated by the framers of the Federal Constitution, the will of the framers would be entirely subverted if the doctrines of the initiative and the recall of the judiciary were allowed to stand in this proposed constitution of the proposed State of Arizona. Under the provision of Article IV, subdivision 1, section 2, of that proposed constitution, 10 per cent of the qualified electors shall have the right to propose any measure and 15 per cent shall have the right to propose any amendment to the constitution. Suppose 15 per cent of the qualified electors should propose an amendment to the constitution of that State, which amendment was entirely repugnant to some provision of the Constitution of the United States. Say the amendment is proposed at a period of great popular excitement and is adopted by a majority of the votes cast thereon, and upon proclamation of the governor it is declared to be the law, as provided in section 5 of Article IV, subdivision 1, of the said proposed constitution. The question of the constitutionality of this amendment is then taken to the courts of Arizona for adjudication. The judges, bound by their oaths to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws of our country, decide that the proposed amendment is, in fact, unconstitutional. Immediately petitions for the recall of these judges are circulated, and at a subsequent election, held in conformity with the provision of the recall article of this proposed constitution, these judges are recalled and their places are filled by men who are apparently in sympathy with the popular demand of the people.

New initiative petitions are circulated, and in four months there is another election on these same questions—questions that may be absolutely antagonistic to some of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. This time the newly elected judges declare them constitutional, in conformity with the popular demand. Does anyone think for a single moment that a republican form of government can truly continue to exist under such conditions? Would such conditions not lead to anarchy? Ah, but some of the friends of the initiative and the recall will say that I have stated an extreme case. Let me remind them that governments are put to severe tests on many occasions. When the founders of our Government framed the Constitution in order to establish a more perfect union they did not realize that within 75 years millions of men would be found under arms to determine by the arbitrament of war that the Government which they had launched in the expectation that it would bestow untold blessings upon the millions who would come after them would be put to such a terrible test. [Applause.] It is much safer to prevent any possible contingencies of the character that I have suggested. And if nothing else be done by this House in the matter of approving this proposed constitution, it would be the part of wisdom and safety to compel the people of Arizona to eliminate from their constitution the recall provisions at least so far as they relate to the judiciary, and to guarantee that no such provision should at any time be adopted by the electors of the proposed State.

If judges who render opinions that do not meet with popular approval had been subject to recall under some provision of the Federal Constitution, John Marshall, Roger B. Taney, and many other judges of the Federal courts would have had to defend their titles to their places on the Federal bench. As a matter of fact our Federal judges have always stood high in the estimation of their countrymen as men of unquestioned probity and sterling integrity. [Applause.] Invariably they have had the confidence of our citizens, and the cases in which that confidence has been misplaced are so few that they may be considered a negligible quantity.

It is undoubtedly true that the chief reason why these jurists have been held in such high esteem is that they were appointed during good behavior, or practically for life, and were not subject to change by reason of a change in political conditions.

Madison, who is universally recognized as having been one of the ablest men in that convention of able men who framed the Constitution, speaking of the judiciary, says in The Federalist:

According to the provisions of most of the constitutions, as well as according to the most respectable and received opinions on the subject, the members of the judiciary department are to retain their offices by the firm tenure of good behavior.

* * * * * * *

The tenure by which the judges are to hold their places is, as it unquestionably ought to be, that of good behavior.

Does anyone seriously contend that the same high standard could be maintained if these judges were to become subject to the recall? To my mind it is ridiculous to think so. Instead of jurists absolutely independent in thought and action the bench would be occupied by weak and pliant creatures of the popular will, who would ever have their ears to the ground to find out which would prove the most popular way to decide questions of great public import.

I think the situation was admirably stated by the junior Senator from the State of California [Mr. WORKS] when he was the Senator-elect, in a letter to one of his friends in the California Legislature while this very question was pending before that body. It was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 27 last, and reads as follows:

I am glad you had the courage and good judgment to oppose the application of the recall to judges. The future of this country is greatly dependent upon a fearless and independent judiciary. Any conscientious man, who has served as judge, will tell you that he has been compelled by his oath and his sense of duty to render decisions that were unpopular with him, and if left free to exercise his own desires no such decisions would have been rendered. Indeed, the most difficult thing a judge has to do is to control his own feelings and decide cases according to law and not according to his own feelings of sympathy or the reverse.

Such a judge will, of necessity, render decisions that are unpopular with the public as well as himself in the performance of his imperative duty. It will be just such unpopular decisions that will arouse public resentment and induce the recall of the judge who has the honesty and the courage to do his duty, often against his own feelings. The judge who will bow to his own feelings or to public clamor, often ill founded, will never be recalled, while the judge who does his duty will fall a victim to the public indignation, based on wholly false ideas of the duty of a judge. We will still have judges that will do their duty fearlessly in spite of the big stick in the form of the recall. I hope we have courageous men enough in the legislature to resist the public clamor that is pressing for this legislation, that will make the weak judge weaker and encourage the dishonest judge to decide cases in such way as to secure public favor instead of deciding the law without fear, favor, or affection. It will be a sorry day to this State when a law is passed that must, in the nature of things, degrade the judiciary and make it less honest, less fearless, less independent. No possible good can come of such legislation, while much harm may, and almost certainly will, result if any such law is enacted and attempted to be enforced.

[Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Right in that connection will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield at present. I will answer all questions when I have concluded my speech.

Mr. RAKER. It is so appropriate right here.

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield.

Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly concur in these sentiments, and, as I stated before, the people of California have found that under existing laws, without having had to resort to such dangerous and doubtful experiments in popular government as the initiative, referendum, and recall, they were able to elect honest officials who have proved faithful to the trust that has been imposed upon them by the people of that State. But, under section 5 of Article VIII of the proposed Arizona constitution, only one recall petition shall be filed against the same official during the term for which he was elected "unless"—mark this language—"unless petitioners signing such petition shall first pay into the public treasury, which has paid such election expenses, all expenses of the preceding election." The judges of every State are called upon at times to decide questions where great interests are involved and where big stakes hang in the balance. Suppose, for the sake of argument, a conscientious judge decides a case according to the law as he construes it and against some powerful corporate interests. Perhaps in its scope the decision affects millions of dollars' worth of property.

The corporation, feeling incensed at the decision of the judge, gets out petitions for his recall. The recall election takes place, and the judge is sustained by his constituency. The corporation being soulless and possessed of large means determines to harass and worry the judge. It can easily afford to pay the expenses of the preceding election, and in a brief period of time it does so and starts out to secure new recall petitions against this very judge. There is no inhibition in Article VIII against such a course, always provided, however, that the petitioners "pay all of the expense of the preceding election." And unless a law were passed under the provisions of section 6 of Article VIII of the proposed constitution which would allow the payment by the public treasury of the reasonable special-election campaign expenses of the officer, the judge would have to bear the burden of these expenses out of his annual salary of $3,000, $3,500, or $4,000, according to the judicial district in which the court is located. But aside from this question of paying the special-election campaign expenses of the judge, would not the attempt to recall him harass, worry, and annoy the conscientious official?

I dare say that very few able, honest, and efficient jurists would want to continue on the bench under such circumstances and conditions. In the very nature of things justice would be throttled ultimately, and men of character and ability would never aspire to judicial office in that State. [Applause.]

Indeed, it is my firm belief that in those States in which the recall of officials may be adopted the corporations and powerful interests will attempt to utilize those provisions to harass and worry those public officials whom they can not control. It is a most dangerous weapon against honest officials. Heretofore such corporations have tried to defeat the officer, who had refused to yield to their blandishments, for renomination, or failing in that, at the polls.

Under the recall they will not have to wait so long as formerly to wreak their vengeance upon the man who has proved faithful to his trust, and who has refused to succumb to the demands of these corporations or powerful interests. Under our present system they have to wait until the offending official's term of office is about to expire. Under the new dispensation they can seek to oust him immediately, and, failing the first time, they can keep up the contest against the faithful official until he will give up his position in sheer disgust. [Applause.]

It has been contended by some of those favoring the recall that it is not a new proposition, but that it was in vogue before our Federal Constitution was adopted. Article V of the Articles of Confederation provided that—

For the more convenient management of the general interest of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead, for the remainder of the year. * * *

This provision was entirely omitted from the Constitution of 1787, no doubt because it was found to be harmful and impractical. The Articles of Confederation, soon after their adoption, were found to be weak and unsatisfactory in many particulars. Probably one of the very sources of weakness was this very provision for the recall of delegates by the legislature of a State at any time within the year and the sending in their places of new delegates. It does not require any great stretch of the imagination to realize what might happen if an important measure were under consideration, a measure that had been thoroughly discussed for a long period of time, and just before the vote was to be taken on its rejection or adoption the delegates of any State should be confronted by a new set of delegates who brought with them the authority of the legislature of their State for the recall of the sitting delegates. How could these new delegates, not being familiar with the discussion on the merits or demerits of the proposed law, vote intelligently thereon? The situation is obvious, and I need hardly pursue the subject further.

And it is a matter of record that frequently the States failed to send any delegates at all to the Congress during the days of the Articles of Confederation.

"But," say some of those who favor the recall, "when the Constitution of 1787 was framed the reactionaries were in control and th— provided that the several States should no longer be able to recall their representatives."

Now, it must be remembered that John Dickinson, who planned the Articles of Confederation, was also a member of the convention which framed the Federal Constitution and which omitted the recall from its provisions. Evidently John Dickinson, the author of the Articles of Confederation in 1776, must have been captured, body and soul, by the reactionaries of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and converted to their cause, for he unhesitatingly gave his entire approval to the new Constitution, notwithstanding the elimination therefrom of the sacred recall provision of the Articles of Confederation. On September 17, 1787, he joined with his colleagues in signing the historic instrument.

Nor did the legislature of his State or the citizens of his State deprecate his action in so doing, for John Dickinson was a delegate to the convention from the State of Delaware, and Delaware was the very first of the original 13 States to ratify the Constitution.

According to the logic of some of the advocates of the recall, the constituents of John Dickinson must all have become reactionaries, for they promptly placed the stamp of their approval upon the work of their delegate, John Dickinson, even though he had consented to the omission of the recall from the provisions of the proposed new Constitution.

Some of those who favor this legislation may believe that it would be a difficult thing to secure the necessary signatures to a petition for a recall, unless the people were aroused against some particular official. But let me call these facts to their attention. Election contests are usually rather close. In the total vote of a State like Arizona, there may be a difference of only 300 or 400 votes between the successful candidate and his opponent. As a matter of fact there was only a difference of 708 votes between the present Delegate from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and his opponent, Mr. Smith, in a total vote for Delegate of 26,367, at the general election held in the Territory on November 2, 1908.

It has been frequently asserted that our Government is a government by parties. I believe that to be true. If party spirit should run high—and it mostly always does—does anyone feel that it would be difficult to get the signatures of 25 per cent of the electors for a recall petition? And there is not a Member on this floor that is not thoroughly familiar with the fact that hundreds of people sign petitions without even looking to see what they are signing. I feel that, as a general rule, there would be mighty little difficulty in securing the necessary number of signatures.

And right now let me observe that I believe these questions of the adoption or the rejection of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall as a part of our legislative system and our election system, to be highly important ones. They ought to be discussed frankly, freely, fully, and without asperity. I have read much upon these subjects, and in the course of my reading I have often found that the proponents of these propositions were entirely intolerant of criticism and opposition.

They have frequently indulged in most scathing denunciation of those who honestly and sincerely oppose these new and unusual methods of legislation and election. "Creatures of the corporations," "hirelings of the interests," "enemies of the people" are some of the epithets that have been hurled at those who have had the temerity to array themselves among the "doubting Thomases." In many cases the latter have retorted with "demagogue," "dreamer," "impractical theorist," "fanatic," "fool." It all goes to show the intense interest that has been awakened in the discussion of these questions throughout the country; but villification and abuse never yet settled a controversy. Applying epithets hurts no one except him who indulges in the practice. Every man is entitled to have his own views upon these questions and to express those views freely and openly. It is good that they should be discussed freely and openly in order that the people themselves, who will be the last resort in determining whether they should be tried or rejected, may understand their demerits as well as their merits. And it is certainly not in a captious spirit that I am discussing them from my point of view in connection with the proposed constitution of the proposed State of Arizona.

It certainly is not my purpose to question the motives that actuate those who favor or those who oppose these provisions. I believe that many of the advocates as well as the opponents of these experiments in republican form of government are undoubtedly sincere; but doubtless, too, there are also many who attach themselves to what they consider the popular side of the controversy in the hope of future political preferment.

The latter form a dangerous element in our political system. That fact was pointed out by Alexander Hamilton during the discussion on the adoption of the Federal Constitution. He said in his letter in The Federalist "On the Purpose of the Writer"— > a dangerous ambition more often lurks behind the specious mask of zeal for the rights of the people than under the forbidding appearance of zeal for the firmness and efficiency of government. History will teach us that the former has been found a much more certain road to the introduction of despotism than the latter, and that of those men who have overturned the liberties of republics the greatest number have begun their career by paying an obsequious court to the people, commencing demagogues and ending tyrants.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to point out the grave danger that would befall the judiciary of that proposed State if this proposed constitution were accepted as it has been presented to us.

But aside from its effects upon the judiciary, I believe that the so-called recall is of doubtful benefit to the people of any State. Why, sir, there is scarcely one of our national heroes against whom a recall petition would not have been filed at some period during his official incumbency if the laws of the land had permitted it. When Washington sent the Jay treaty to the Senate to be ratified, there was such an outburst of disapproval on all sides that within 48 hours after its provisions became known the necessary recall petitions would have been signed by thousands of electors in excess of the required percentage, and the Father of his Country might have been relegated to private life long before his countrymen could have had an opportunity to discover the wisdom and the foresight of that great statesman that prompted him to negotiate the treaty which for a brief period of time was looked upon as being so obnoxious to American interests. And does any Member of this House doubt that the immortal Lincoln would have been put to the task of defending his title as Chief Executive of this Republic if, during the dark days of 1862, the recall had been one of the cardinal principles of our Federal Constitution?

Does anyone doubt that enough signatures could have been procured in New England alone, in 1808, for the recall of President Jefferson when the embargo act began to destroy the commerce of that section?

Does anyone doubt that enough signatures could have been procured for the recall of President Madison in that same New England, in 1813 or 1814, during the progress of the War of 1812?

Does anyone doubt that enough signatures could have been procured in the South for the recall of President Roosevelt immediately after he had invited Booker T. Washington to lunch with him at the White House? [Laughter and applause.]

And so I could keep on enumerating instances where popular feeling ran high in certain localities against public officials, where there would have been no difficulty in securing the signatures of the necessary 15, or 20, or 25 per cent of the voters required by the law to put the official to the task of defending his right to continue in office.

And if the recall be a good thing for a single State, why is it not likewise a good thing for the entire Nation? But, Mr. Chairman, can it even be said that it is a good thing for a municipality? Let me read to you an editorial from the Wilkes-Barre Record of May 5, 1911, on the recall experience of the City of Tacoma, State of Washington:

ONE RECALL EXPERIENCE.

Those who revel in the excitement of a political campaign can wish for nothing more satisfying than the recall system as it is being operated in the city of Tacoma. On the 5th of April an election was held to determine whether the mayor should be ousted before the expiration of his term. None of the candidates received a majority of the votes cast and another election was held ten days later. This time the mayor was deprived of his seat. Two weeks later, on the 2d of May, the required petition having been filed, the four city commissioners were hauled up for the ordeal. The election was not decisive and another election has been ordered for the 16th of May. If this contest does not give a majority the citizens will have to try again. When the commissionership has been disposed of the requisite number of citizens may take it into their heads to petition for the recall of some other officers, if there are any others subject to the law.

With officeholders liable to be called into three or four campaigns during a single term, perhaps on the initiative of political machines whom they offend, how long will Tacoma or any other city that adopts a similar system be able to induce men of the right caliber to run for office? How long will the better class of voters take an interest in this kind of business and go to the polls to give expression to the honest sentiment of the majority whenever a handful of citizens compels an election? The recall may be enticing in theory, but carried out on the Tacoma plan it stands a good chance of defeating the very purpose which it was intended to accomplish.

It is evident that the politicians of Tacoma soon discovered the latent possibilities that lurk in the innocent-looking provisions of the recall law, and they have thus early started to play the game to its logical conclusion. In the meantime the taxpayer is footing the bills. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the recall has never been tried as a State-wide proposition. It has been tried in a few communities, and there seems to be some difference of opinion as to its efficacy even in municipalities. The experiences of the city of Tacoma may have had their counterpart in other localities. I can not say as to that. But any one familiar with republican institutions must realize that numerous elections are not a good thing. Perhaps one of the great defects in our system is "too much politics" and too many elections. One election, or, at the very outside, two elections, in a year may bring out a fairly large proportion of the voting population.

But as the number of elections increases the number of voters at each succeeding election in that year will decrease materially. That, I believe, has generally been the experience of municipalities. It has been the experience in the country in which the initiative and referendum originated—Switzerland. And thus questions of most vital importance to all the people of a community may be determined by an exceedingly small proportion of the voting population. "But we must pass a law to compel people to vote," some enthusiastic believer in the new cult will proclaim. In fact, I have seen such a proposition mooted on more than one occasion. The citizen must be made to exercise his franchise. It certainly sounds mighty alluring. And some day it may be proposed in some State or in some municipality that already has adopted the initiative. Well, Mr. Chairman, that proposition has also been in vogue in some of the Cantons of Switzerland—that land of beauty and of grandeur, which is also responsible for the referendum and the initiative. But how has it operated in the Canton of Zurich, for example? It is true the people go to the polls under this compulsory voting law. It is true that they vote, but in thousands of instances they vote blank ballots. Mr. Albert Bushnell Hart, whom I have already quoted, says:

> In Zurich there is a compulsory voting law, of which the curious result is that in both national and cantonal referenda many thousands of blank ballots are cast.

Mr. Chairman, Article VIII, subdivision 2, of the proposed constitution of Arizona provides a second method of removing officials, to wit, by impeachment. It is the method employed in the Federal Constitution and in practically every State constitution as the mode of procedure against any official charged with malfeasance in office. It is seldom invoked, but in those instances where it has been called into requisition it has generally proved sufficiently efficacious to have met the emergencies that had arisen. It is, in my judgment, a much safer and a much firmer base to stand upon than is the insecure and experimental one of the recall. [Applause.]

The framers of the Federal Constitution realized fully the danger of passing laws during periods of great excitement. And so they determined that a considerable length of time should elapse between the election of Members of Congress and the convening of the new Federal legislative body. In most of the States nearly 13 months must elapse between the date of the election of its Representatives to the Congress and their actual induction into office. But the framers also recognized the fact that conditions might arise that would require immediate congressional action, and so they wisely gave the Chief Executive the authority to call an extraordinary session whenever, in his judgment, the circumstances might warrant such a course. And time has fully vindicated the wisdom of the fathers in having framed the organic laws, so that any extraordinary conditions of great excitement at the close of one Congress will be materially allayed by the time the succeeding Congress is called to order.

Mr. Chairman, we have had during the 122 years of our history as a nation many illustrations of the comparative rapidity with which people change their views upon public questions. It is needless for me to go into details. One instance, with respect to the government of municipalities, will suffice. About 25 years ago it was felt throughout the country that the very best form of government for our cities would be found in the election of one responsible head, who should have full power to appoint all commissioners and certain other subordinates. These commissioners and subordinates were to be accountable to the responsible head, and the people, under such conditions, could hold this responsible head to a strict account of his stewardship. Whenever, under this system, the responsible head was himself an honest, efficient official who made good appointments, the plan worked admirably.

But in a number of cases the men elected to the mayoralty proved recreant to the trust the people had imposed upon them. They appointed inefficient or corrupt commissioners and subordinates. In consequence a demand for a change has been growing in all parts of the country. The responsible-head idea in more recent years has been looked upon with more or less disfavor, and to-day the so-called commission plan, is being advocated as the ideal system. That is an apt illustration also of how things that sound well in theory oftentimes work badly in practice. Why, sir, within the past few months I myself witnessed an incident that was indicative of the rapidity with which people sometimes change their opinions. In the latter part of November, 1910, I was a delegate to the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Waterways Convention at the city of St. Louis, Mo. There were some 1,500 delegates in attendance. They came from many sections of the Union. They were men of affairs, merchants, lawyers, doctors, civil engineers, scientists, financiers, farmers, and representative citizens in many other walks of life. They were intensely in earnest. The adoption of their views in regard to the deepening of the Mississippi River to a depth of 14 feet lay near to their hearts. They felt that there was a disposition on the part of the President of the United States to give them much less than they had asked for. The committee on resolutions brought in its report, and in that report there were some rather disparaging remarks about the President. I remember the prolonged cheers that greeted the uncomplimentary references to the Chief Executive. It was some little time before order could be restored.

The resolution evidently echoed the sentiment of a large majority of those present. When quiet had been restored and the question of the adoption of the report was submitted to the delegates, there arose a gentleman who moved to strike out the words which he considered to be a reflection upon the President. There was an uproar immediately, and realizing that he was in a hopeless minority, he withdrew his amendment to strike out the offensive words. Thereupon my distinguished friend and colleague from the State of Missouri, Dr. BARTHOLDT, who was also a delegate, renewed the motion, and in a few well-chosen sentences gave reasons why the objectionable language should be stricken from the resolutions. He was followed immediately by the governor of Illinois, who, in a forceful and vigorous speech of about 20 minutes' duration, completely changed the sentiment of that convention, and the very men who had so vociferously cheered the offensive aspersions a few minutes earlier were cheering just as lustily to have them stricken from the resolutions.

And it is only necessary to recite the historic incident of Marc Antony's oration over the dead body of Julius Ceasar to demonstrate the fickleness of the multitude at times. I need not recite the story here. It is familiar to every schoolboy. And what happened in the Roman forum 2,000 years ago has had its counterpart many times in the progress of human advancement.

The people, in these days of the railroad, the steamship, the telegraph, the telephone, and other methods of speedily disseminating news, are perhaps a little more prone to change their minds than were the people in those days when Rome was mistress of the world. In our everyday life we have learned to realize that the sensation of to-day becomes the "chestnut" of to-morrow. [Laughter and applause.] And all these experiences go to show that mankind are prone to err. Perhaps the most hopeful sign in our present-day civilization is the promptness with which the masses are willing to reverse their judgment when they find that they have been in error. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as it is with cities, so it is with States. What may be found to work admirably in one State by reason of the conditions existing therein may not work at all in some other State. And the people of the latter State may be just as patriotic, just as honest, and just as virtuous as are the people of the former State. The framers of the Constitution realized that governments ought not to be easily changed, nor upon slight provocation. In his Farewell Address, Washington uses this language:

> Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which will impair the energy of the system and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitutions of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that from the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a Government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensible.

[Applause.]

These sentiments are replete with political wisdom, and I believe the Congress would be remiss in its duty if it did not heed the splendid advice of the Father of his Country.

I have come to the conclusion that this bill for the admission of Arizona as a State into the Union ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Territories with certain instructions.

There should be a condition precedent to the promulgation of a proclamation admitting Arizona as a State that the people of that Territory must eliminate the article relating to the recall. At any rate, the recall should never be permitted to include the judiciary. Not until such conditions shall have been complied with should the Territory be admitted as a State into the Union. There are numerous instances in the history of this country where certain constitutional provisions have been imposed upon Territories as a condition precedent to their admission into the sisterhood of States.

Thus the act of 1802, under which Ohio was admitted into the Union, prescribed as a fundamental condition that its constitution should not be repugnant to the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory. The sixth article of that Ordinance declares that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. A similar condition was imposed by the Congress upon the people of Indiana and Illinois. The State of Louisiana before it could be admitted was required by the Congress to provide in its constitution for trial by jury, for the writ of habeas corpus, and for the principles of civil and religious liberty. Said State was also required to keep its records and its judicial and legislative proceedings in the English language. Its people were also required to surrender all claim to all unappropriated lands in the Territory, and to prohibit the taxing of any lands of the United States. A condition was imposed upon the people of Missouri, which required that the Territory should take a census and should be admitted only upon condition that the census should disclose the fact that there were 40,000 inhabitants within its borders. The bill was amended by Congress before it became a law so that the constitution of the proposed State of Missouri should prevent the State from taxing lands of the United States situate therein, and also declaring that all navigable waters within the State should remain open to the other States and should be exempt from any tolls and duties. Utah was compelled to insert a stringent provision in her proposed constitution that no law establishing polygamy in the proposed State should ever be enacted. Does anyone doubt the wisdom of Congress in having insisted on such a provision in the organic law of the State of Utah? And have the people of that State ever attempted to defy the Congress by amendment of their constitution in that particular since the inhibition was imposed upon them? Why, of course not. And so I could cite innumerable instances where fundamental conditions have been imposed from time to time upon proposed new States as the price of their admission as States into the Union.

If the Congress had the power heretofore to require such fundamental constitutional provisions as conditions precedent upon which the proposed new States were to be admitted, it seems to me that it has the power to-day to require of any of her Territories that seek admission that the proposed State constitution of that Territory should carry a fundamental provision that the judiciary should never be subject to recall. I believe firmly that such a provision should be insisted upon in this case. It has been argued that even if the present proposed constitution were adopted upon the express condition that the people of the Territory of Arizona should have an opportunity to vote upon the recall provision separately, and if the said provision should, for the time being, be rescinded, that after the admission of the Territory as a State the people therein could still, by amendment of the constitution, reenact the objectionable provisions of the present proposed constitution. That is undoubtedly true. And for that very reason I believe that the Committee on the Territories should be instructed to report the bill back with a fundamental condition so that the constitution of said State shall never be amended so as to provide for the recall of the judiciary of that State. I believe that in practically every instance where such fundamental conditions were imposed the people recognized the sacredness of the obligation and religiously maintained the mandate of Congress as binding upon the proposed State.

It may seem somewhat drastic to insist upon such a condition, but I believe that the situation warrants it.

The enabling act admitting Arizona and New Mexico as separate States is itself an unusual enabling act. That act was passed by Congress with the language that compels the submission of a certified copy of the proposed constitution, and such provisions thereof as have been separately submitted, to the President of the United States and to the Congress for approval. The very purpose of inserting such provisions in the enabling act was to allow the Congress to scrutinize the proposed constitution before the full rights of statehood should be accorded. And having scrutinized the proposed constitution of Arizona and having found provisions which must seem repugnant to our institutions we are justified in insisting upon a condition precedent that the proposed constitution be so amended as to forever preclude the possibility of having the judiciary of the proposed State subject to the doubtful and dangerous expediency of recall. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MURRAY). Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KAHN. I do.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to inquire if it is not a fact that the initiative, referendum, and recall are new elements in American politics?

Mr. KAHN. They have been mooted and discussed for a good many years; they are not altogether new elements.

Mr. FOWLER. In American politics?

Mr. KAHN. Not altogether new elements; no.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to inquire what the gentleman regards as the cause and growth of the sentiment for initiative, referendum, and recall in America?

Mr. KAHN. They sound good, and a good many agitators, in the hope of being elected to office, have advocated them. A good many of the muckrake magazines of this country have also advocated them. I dare say the gentleman will find that a good many of those who advocate them have never given them careful or serious consideration.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that these three elements have found their way into American politics because of the abuse of power by those who have been trusted by the people?

Mr. KAHN. I do not believe that that is the fact at all.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that Great Britain has a recall system in her Parliament which has been in vogue for centuries?

Mr. KAHN. That is not the case. As I understand the British system it is this: The members of Parliament are elected at intervals of seven years. There is a ministry appointed, and this ministry assumes all responsibility for government, and if at any time the ministry is defeated in the Parliament on an important measure that they may have proposed, they resign from office and appeal to the country.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask the gentleman if that system has ever proved detrimental to the British Government?

Mr. KAHN. That is not the system proposed by the initiative and referendum at all. The gentleman does not know what the initiative and referendum are if he tries to couple the British parliamentary system with the system proposed under the referendum and recall. The people of Great Britain never propose bills by initiative, nor do they vote upon them by referendum after Parliament has passed them. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understand that Oregon has incorporated the recall into its constitution. I suppose the gentleman will admit that every other State in the Union, if the people saw fit to do likewise, could adopt it. If the gentleman concedes that, I want to ask him if it is fair to Arizona to impose upon that State a condition that will forever forbid or prevent the people of that State from incorporating the same provision in their constitution?

Mr. KAHN. If the people of other States make mistakes, let us guard against the people making a similar mistake in Arizona.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. New Mexico might incorporate the recall into its constitution in the course of a few years, and they would not be forbidden to do it as would Arizona.

Mr. KAHN. Well, as far as that is concerned, New Mexico had the opportunity to do it, and she showed a rational spirit in the formation of her constitution, and we are willing to trust the wisdom of her people.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Well, she might get irrational like California did.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not hear all of the gentleman's speech, and for information I would like to know whether he contends that if this recall provision shall remain in the Arizona constitution they would not have a republican form of government?

Mr. KAHN. In the true sense of the word I do not think they would have a republican form of government.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to ask the gentleman this question, as to whether he believes the constitutional provision in our Federal Constitution of guaranteeing a republican form of government is not a continuing duty on Congress?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I think it is.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to ask the gentleman whether his State of California has not proposed a constitutional amendment to be submitted to the people for the recall of judges?

Mr. KAHN. I am sorry to say that has been done, but so long as I have voice or breath I shall protest against it with all of the energy and vigor that I can command. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Just one more question. I want to ask the gentleman this: If his State of California shall adopt that constitutional amendment, whether he believes it will then be the duty of Congress to exclude California from the Union because it has not a republican form of government? [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. That is up to the courts and the Congress. I thought, however, the gentleman was also referring to the initiative and referendum. I think the initiative is undoubtedly unrepublican. I think it probable that the recall is not unrepublican. Perhaps I may add that I believe the initiative would ultimately lead to the destruction of all government. It would lead to anarchy.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that in the last Republican platform adopted in September by the Republicans of California they adopted the initiative, referendum, and recall?

Mr. KAHN. They did, and I am sorry for that; but the last Democratic national platform provided for free lumber, and yet dozens of Democrats on your side voted against free lumber.

Mr. RAKER. Now, is it not a fact that the gentleman and all those who stood on the Republican side in California stood by the officers to elect them upon the platform of the initiative, referendum, and recall, and upon the same platform and in the same building?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield me one minute more.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Republican platform did contain such a plank. I was not consulted in the making of that platform, nor was I present at the convention at which the platform was formulated. If I had been, I would probably have opposed it, although I had not given the subject the study and thought that I have given it since then. I stated on this floor awhile ago that I was at one time disposed to favor them. They looked good in theory to me. After having studied these innovations, however, I am entirely opposed to them, and so long as I continue in public life and so long as I live I will keep on raising my voice against those provisions, for I consider them exceedingly detrimental to the continued welfare of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, in view of the interest manifested by the people of California and the entire Pacific coast in the subject of Japanese immigration, which was widely discussed when the new Japanese treaty was before the Senate for ratification during the last session of Congress, I desire to insert herewith in the RECORD some very significant figures furnished by the Department of Commerce and Labor. These figures show the arrival and departure of Japanese for both the United States proper and the Territory of Hawaii from July 1, 1908, to March 1, 1911. Within this period there arrived at United States ports 7,501 Japanese, while 14,195 sailed for Japan. This does not look like an invasion. In Hawaii, regarding which Territory much concern has been expressed, there were 4,348 arrivals and 6,266 departures. In other words, 6,694 more Japanese left continental United States than arrived, and 1,918 more left Hawaii than came into that Territory.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, during what time was that?

Mr. KNOWLAND. During the period I have just stated, from the 1st of July, 1908, to the 1st of March, 1911. Taking the combined figures of both the continent of the United States and the Territory of Hawaii there were 8,612 more Japanese who took their departure for the Empire of Japan than entered the continent of the United States and the Territory of Hawaii. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 8, 1911.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 28th ultimo you are advised that the records of this bureau show that more Japanese have left the United States during the past three years than have arrived. The arrivals and departures for continental United States and Hawaii since July 1, 1908, were as follows:

Period.	Continental United States.		Hawaii.
	Arrived.	Departed.	Arrived.	Departed.
Fiscal year ended June 30, 1909	2,432	5,004	1,493	2,378
Fiscal year ended June 30, 1910	2,598	5,024	1,527	2,355
Eight months ended Feb. 28, 1911	2,471	4,167	1,328	1,533

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES EARL, Acting Secretary.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? I was interested in his statement. The Japanese who leave the United States or leave Hawaii, have they the right under the law to return?

Mr. KNOWLAND. To return to Hawaii?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Or to the United States.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Of course, there is no exclusion law to keep them out, but a sort of gentlemen's agreement, which was discussed at the time the Japanese treaty was before the Senate for ratification.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand that. Is it the gentleman's understanding that these——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This is an interesting subject and I desire to get this information, and I would like to have the gentleman's time extended——

Mr. LANGHAM. I will yield the gentleman one minute additional.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Under this gentlemen's agreement will these Japanese who have returned to their native land have the right to come back to Hawaii and the United States, or will they, under the terms of that agreement, be kept out?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Well, I should judge, if they are laborers, that under the terms of that agreement they would not return.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in June, 1910, we passed an act to enable the people of the Territory of New Mexico to adopt a constitution and to become a State, and to enable the people of Arizona to adopt a constitution and become a State.

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I did not intend to yield because I wanted to shorten my remarks, but I can not refuse the gentleman.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Did not they adopt the constitutions?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; they did.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Then what have we got to do with it, so long as they conformed to our requirements?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I will try to make that plain. I thought perhaps the gentleman had heard these debates.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I heard them.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Perhaps I may be able to add something to the gentleman's information. In that enabling act we provided for the election of delegates to constitutional conventions to be held in each of the Territories. We provided for the organization of the delegates into constitutional conventions, and then we provided that after these constitutional conventions should have formed constitutions the constitutions should be submitted to the people of the respective Territories for ratification or rejection.

The constitution of New Mexico was ratified by the people of New Mexico in January last. The constitution of Arizona was ratified by the people of Arizona in February last. We provided that if those constitutions were ratified they should be certified to the President of the United States and to the Congress, and then we provided as to each constitution that if Congress should approve and the President should approve, or if the President should approve and Congress should not disapprove during its next regular session, then the President should certify the fact to the governor in each case and State officers might be elected.

Mr. TRIBBLE. One more question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Do the constitutions that those two Territories ratified conform to a republican form of government?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think the constitution of New Mexico does, and I think it would be difficult to say that the constitution of Arizona does not.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is the very point I am driving at. If it does, what has this Congress to do with it? Are they not capable of judging for themselves?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I did not propose to go into that, but I will try to make it clear Congress has time and again annexed other conditions than that constitutions should be republican in form, and so forth. In enabling acts heretofore we have not provided that constitutions should be submitted to Congress at all. We have provided that if the constitution permitted to be formed should be republican in form and not repugnant to the Declaration of Independence, and should be in conformity with the enabling act, the President should make proclamation of that fact, and the Territory seeking admission might within a given time become a State. Now, in this enabling act we have departed from that course, and have said that the constitution shall not only be submitted to the President, but to the Congress of the United States, and we have given the power to the President to approve and the power to Congress to approve or disapprove. Now, the very fact that we have set out the power of approval or disapproval separate and apart from the condition that the constitution shall be republican in form and not repugnant to the Declaration of Independence to my mind forms an argument that the President may refuse to approve the constitution or Congress may refuse to approve the constitution for other reasons than those involved in a construction of the terms ordinarily incorporated in enabling acts requiring that constitutions shall be republican in form, and so forth. I know it is contended otherwise, but I think the very purpose of that clause in the enabling act was to give the President the power to approve or disapprove and the power to Congress to approve or disapprove, outside of whether the constitution is republican in form or repugnant to the Declaration of Independence.

Now, it is a matter of common knowledge that the constitution of Arizona has in it a provision which has challenged the opposition of a good many Members, both of the House and of the Senate, and it is a matter of common knowledge that the President has expressed himself as opposed particularly to the provision permitting the recall of judges.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Before the gentleman goes to that point I would like to ask his opinion if, under the present situation, he thinks it is necessary to the admission of these States that the President approve these constitutions? Under this resolution pending now, as the gentleman has observed, they do not require the approval of the President——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think they do—that is, I think his approval or disapproval of the constitutions is involved.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi (continuing). But they will be admitted under the terms prescribed. Does the gentleman think that the acts of the last Congress will still be in force and the President will have to approve?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. While the pending resolution modifies the enabling act in some respects, still the pending resolution can not become a law without the signature of the President, and his signature necessarily operates as approval of the constitutions.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I will.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Does not the gentleman think that this resolution repeals the enabling act, so far as the President having to approve affirmatively all the provisions of the constitutions of Arizona and New Mexico is concerned?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The President will have to sign this joint resolution if it becomes law.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Of course, he will have to sign as a part of the legislative department of the Government, but I mean, so far as approving the provisions of those constitutions affirmatively, does not the gentleman think this resolution will repeal that portion of the enabling act?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would not think so. The joint resolution proposes to admit these Territories as States according to the terms of the enabling act as modified by the joint resolution; but the power of Congress and the power of the President to approve or disapprove is still involved. Let us consider the two constitutions separately. The President has approved the constitution of New Mexico, and he has sent a message to Congress declaring he has done so. Now, if Congress does not disapprove the constitution of New Mexico during the next regular session, New Mexico will become a State without any further procedure.

As to Arizona, the case is different. The Arizona constitution did not arrive here until probably a day or two after the adjournment of the last session of Congress, although I think one gentleman contended that it did arrive sometime in the night of March 3. But I do not believe anybody knows about that. Now, the President has not approved the Arizona constitution, and the enabling act provides that if the President shall approve and Congress shall approve, or if the President shall approve and Congress shall not disapprove during its next regular session, then the people of Arizona may become a State.

By the terms of this joint resolution Congress is approving or disapproving pursuant to the enabling act as modified by the joint resolution, and when the President signs or vetoes this joint resolution he either approves or disapproves the constitutions. In any case, your joint resolution will have to have the signature of the President, and if you have in your joint resolution a provision providing for the recall of judges, you would probably force the President, unless he should retract, to refuse to sign your joint resolution. Then what will be the effect? Arizona will still be a Territory and the position of New Mexico will be anomalous, because, I fear, the fact that you have incorporated certain provisions in your joint resolution might operate so as to enable them to be considered as a disapproval by a man predisposed that way, although it may well be doubted whether the action of the two Houses on a resolution which never became a law could be said to have any force or effect whatever.

Now, I want to say this——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is, if the Senate concurs, too?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Precisely, if the Senate concurs and if it should go to the President.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, on that recall proposition, I am not trying to ask a difficult question, but——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, I had a matter here that was of interest to me, and I was trying to get to it, but I will yield.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman challenge the recall of judges?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; I do.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And the House challenges that feature. Now, I want to know what right we have to select the judges and challenge that feature and not challenge any of the other elective officers? I am not prepared to say that I am in favor of recalling the judges.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I doubt if the gentleman is in favor of the recall of judges. It is not a partisan question. I feel that it is one of the biggest questions we have had to consider or will have to consider. I know how my friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] feels about it. But to me it seems to be one of the fundamental questions of our national condition.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question right there. I am burning to ask it while such good order prevails. The gentleman holds a republican form of government to be a representative form of government, does he not?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do, and I will tell the gentleman why. But the gentleman knows why I do, does he not?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes. I am satisfied with that answer. The gentleman's principal objection to the Arizona constitution is the recall provision?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, is it not the opinion of the gentleman that the initiative and referendum come far closer to the question of representative government than the recall?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Not the referendum, but the initiative does.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The initiative comes far closer to the question of representative government, which, in the gentleman's opinion, is a republican form of government, than the recall?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In perfect frankness, that is my judgment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And yet the gentleman is directing his attention here to a feature of the Arizona constitution which is less objectionable from the standpoint of a republican form of government than the other feature, about which he is not complaining at all.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am not discussing here the constitutionality of either the initiative or the recall, but I do propose to discuss the expediency of the application of the recall to judges.

Section 1 of article 8 of the Arizona constitution provides that—

> Every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State.

This recall is to be set in motion by a petition signed by 25 per cent of the number of votes cast for all the candidates for the office held by the officer sought to be removed at the last general election.

A STABLE CONSTITUTION.

Let us examine this recall proposition so far as it affects the judiciary.

In the first place, Article IV, section 4, of the Federal Constitution requires that the—> United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

That Constitution down to recent years has been held by the people of the United States to be an almost sacred thing—as Bryce says, in his American Commonwealth, "An ark of the covenant whereon no man may lay rash hands"—but recently every upstart for political favor seeks to inflame the public mind with the idea that this instrument, or some State constitution, ought to be overhauled to express his particular theory, and the Constitution is denounced as antiquated and insufficient for modern needs.

Wendell Phillips once said that formerly a man had to serve an apprenticeship of seven years to make a pair of boots, but that in his time a man might talk seven weeks and become the governor of a great State. He does not have to talk seven weeks now. Seven days is enough.

Now, if a statesman of the spot-light, opéra-bouffe, whirling-dervish variety denounces everybody enough, claims all virtue for himself enough, and indicates that the Constitution is a bungling thing anyway, and that he could have made a better one himself at odd times, a large number of people will recognize that the world has been waiting a long time for him, and will invite him into high places to overhaul the work of ages in 30 minutes.

A written constitution is a safeguard of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The very rigidity of a written constitution is a protection from commercial power and wealth on the one side and the tyranny and intrigue of official power and ambition on the other.

It is a safeguard against extremes. The first popular impulse, even when right, is apt to swing too far one way and then to swing too far the other way before it reaches equilibrium.

A written constitution means definiteness and stability, and definiteness and stability breed respect for law and order.

Free governments owe their existence to security under the law.

Without constitutional restraint laws themselves may become uncertain and even unjust and cease to command the respect of the governed.

Without respect for law and order frequent changes would become inevitable and law thereby become less and less respectable.

Peace and order and property and liberty and life itself hang on the stability of law.

There is danger in seeking flexibility in the fundamental law that we not only throw away backbone and stability, but that we throw away our liberties.

A constitution too easily changed is no constitution at all, but is a moving picture of passing public opinion.

SOUND LEGISLATION.

Our people are above the average in intelligence and in respect for the rights of persons and the rights of things, but the average man is not a constitutional lawyer, neither is he a lawyer at all. He may think himself the better off for that, but even a little learning is not to be despised, and the more a man knows, the more he knows there is to know, and in this way arrogant ignorance sometimes becomes humble.

Zangwill compares us to a melting pot, in which all nationalities are being fused and transformed here into a new nationality, but we are something more than a melting pot of nationalities. We are a melting pot in which all creeds, cults, denominations, ideas, ideals, and institutions are being fused and transformed, and sometimes the more radical and revolutionary the creed, cult, idea, or ideal the more attention it attracts for a time, until some other creed, cult, idea, or ideal boils to the surface.

Bryce observes that there is always an election going on somewhere in the United States, and this also keeps the pot boiling; and sometimes I think there is too much pot boiling; too much noise of political swashbucklers, swashing upon their bucklers; too many gentlemen standing at the doors of too many political tents, each advertising his own greatest show on earth "just upon the inside"; too many political jugglers and tight-rope walkers and sword swallowers and soothsayers.

The laws enacted by the earlier legislative assemblies were few and fundamental, but now 46 States and 3 Territories are grinding out laws, and the courts of 46 States and 3 Territories and the District of Columbia and the District of Alaska and the Canal Zone are grinding out decisions, until our jurisprudence is becoming more and more complex.

The questions that are presented at each session of each Congress and each session of each legislature are such as require the exercise of ripened judgment and expert experience, and this is so because of our greater density of population, our greater territory, our increasing means of transportation, communication, transmutation, and exchange.

It is so because of our increase of poverty and our increase of wealth.

It is so because of our transition from the simple to the complex life.

It is so because of railroads, steamboats, telegraphs, telephones, electricity, typewriters, automobiles, and flying machines.

In proportion as affairs require more solid knowledge, more judgment, more stability to deal with them, shall we turn them over to fickleness, impulse, and prejudice?

POPULAR SENTIMENT AND JUDICIAL DECISIONS.

Let us consider this proposition to make the judiciary subject to the "recall."

That means that if a judge, in the interpretation of the law, shall decide a cause or instruct a jury in a way which might be unwelcome to the people of his district, a percentage of the party which elected him or a percentage of the party which opposed him, or a percentage of both parties, in all amounting to only one-fourth of the total vote cast for judge at the last general election, may demand his recall.

It means that if there should be mob violence and the leading citizens of a community should be involved, a judge, threatened with the recall, might be inclined to shade the law in favor of the defendants.

It means that a federation of interests which dominated a community might also dominate the courts.

It means that if a question of taxation should be involved and a judge should hold a bond issue valid against which public opinion was inflamed, an inflamed public opinion might recall him.

It means that if a judge should hold a bond issue valid and the case should be appealed, and that pending appeal the judge should be recalled, then, if the cause should be sent back for retrial, the bondholder would be driven to seek justice in a tribunal already committed against him, or seek a change of venue—a condition dangerously close to a denial of justice; a condition dangerously close to interference with due process of law.

The disposition of the people to discipline a judge, whose decisions were just but did not for the time accord with popular sentiment, has had many melancholy illustrations.

A judge of the high court of errors and appeals in Mississippi in 1841, joining in a unanimous decision, held a $15,000,000 issue of State bonds valid which the governor had by proclamation declared void. The policy of repudiation was then a political issue in Mississippi, and the people had indorsed it by electing its advocates to the highest offices in the State. The term of the judge soon expired and he was displaced by a judge whose opinions were known to be in accord with popular sentiment.

In 1859 in Ohio a judge of the supreme court was promptly defeated for reelection because in a case before him he, with a majority of the court, had followed a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in sustaining the constitutionality of an unpopular law.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A STATE.

We are making States here and guaranteeing their form of government.

What makes a State? Not population alone, nor any prescribed number of people. The population of States differs as widely as their areas differ. Not land alone, although land is necessary. A people not attached to a definite part of the surface of the earth are no more than a wandering horde—a migratory band.

These—population and land—are necessary, but above all is government. A mass of people occupying a piece of ground do not constitute a State until they have organized themselves into a governmental entity.

What is government? Government is power lodged somewhere to run the affairs of a nation, State, or municipality.

Hamilton, in the Federalist, asks: "Why are governments instituted among men?" and then he answers his own question by saying: "Because the passions of men will not conform to the dictates of reason and justice without restraint." That restraint is sovereignty, and sovereignty is the "unlimited power of the State to impose its will upon all persons, associations, and things within its jurisdiction."

Now, in the organization of government—

It is indispensable that there should be a judicial department to decide rights, to punish crime, to administer justice, and to protect the innocent from injury and usurpation. (Rawle on the Constitution.)

Where there is no judicial department to interpret and execute the law, to decide controversies and to enforce rights—

The Government must either perish by its own imbecility or the other departments of Government must usurp powers for the purpose of commanding obedience, to the destruction of liberty. (Kent's Commentaries.)

Since, then, it is necessary to government that there should be a judiciary, is any argument needed to demonstrate that it should be an independent and stable judiciary?

Kent, in his Commentaries, says:

The independence of the judiciary is just as essential to protect the Constitution and laws against the encroachment of party spirit and the tyranny of faction in a republic as it is in a monarchy to protect the rights of the subject against the injustice of the crown.

Story, in his work on the Constitution, says:

Upon no other branch of the Government are the people so dependent for the enjoyment of personal security and the rights of property, and it is hardly necessary to add that the degree of protection thus afforded is conditioned in turn upon the wisdom, stability, and integrity of the courts.

Edmund Burke, in his "Reflections on the French Revolution," says:

Whatever is supreme in a State it ought to have as much as possible its judicial authority so constituted as not only to depend upon it, but in some sort to balance it. It ought to give security to its justice against its power. It ought to make its judicature, as it were, something exterior to the State.

To fulfill its high purpose, Garner in his Introduction to Political Science says, the judiciary ought therefore to possess learning, faithfulness to the Constitution, independence, and firmness of character.

THE EFFECT OF THE "RECALL" ON THE STABILITY AND INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY.

Since learning, independence, and firmness of character are indispensable to a judiciary, let us inquire what effect the "recall" would have upon these essential qualities.

It is clear that the existence of the qualities of learning, independence, and firmness must depend largely upon: First, the mode of selection of judges; second, the permanency of their tenure; third, the adequacy of their compensation.

Judges may be chosen in three ways: By the legislature, by popular election, or by appointment of the executive with or without the concurrence of the legislative branch.

The legislative choice of judges has not commended itself to statesmen in the past, because it renders the judiciary to some extent dependent upon a coordinate department in violation of the principle of the separation of powers.

Furthermore, the system of legislative choice generally means nomination by a party caucus and frequently a parceling out of judicial positions among political divisions with reference to geographical considerations rather than fitness for the judicial office.

In short, as Chancellor Kent has pointed out in his Commentaries, it presents—too many occasions and too many temptations for intrigue, party prejudice, and local interest, to secure a judiciary best calculated to promote the ends of justice.

Garner, in his introduction to Political Science, says:

Choice by the legislature was a favorite method of selection in the American States for a time after the Revolution, a circumstance due to the prevailing jealousy of the Executive on the one hand and the distrust of popular election on the other. This system, however, has been abandoned in all the States but four (Rhode Island, Vermont, South Carolina, and Virginia), and is not followed by any European country except Switzerland, where the judges of the federal tribunal are chosen by the legislative assembly of the confederation.

The method of popular election is now the rule in the majority of the States.

It can not be denied that the qualities which distinguish an able and fearless judge are not those of the successful politician, and hence judges frequently make poor candidates, and are sometimes defeated by men of less fitness, who are better gifted with the art of winning public favor.

Kent, in his Commentaries, says:

The just and vigorous investigation and punishment of every species of fraud and violence and the exercise of the power of compelling every man to the personal performance of his contracts are grave duties, not of the most popular character, and hence not always calculated to command the calm approval of the popular masses.

The fittest men are likely to have—too much reservedness of manners and severity of morals to secure an election resting on universal suffrage.

JUDGMENT SHOULD BE UNBIASED AND FEARLESS.

The choice of judges by popular election, however, has become a part of the system of our State governments, and has probably come to stay.

It has resulted, on the whole, in the selection of strong men for judges. This is, in part, due to the length of term and to the almost universal respect which until recently the judicial office has inspired.

But it ought to be axiomatic that no judge should be exposed to the necessity of having to curry popular favor in order to retain his office.

Hamilton, in the Federalist, says:

The Executive not only dispenses the honors, but holds the sword of the community.

The legislative not only commands the purse, but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated.

The judiciary, on the contrary, has no influence over either the sword or the purse; no direction either of the strength or the wealth of the society, and can take no active resolution whatever. It may truly be said to have neither force nor will, but merely judgment; and must ultimately depend upon the aid of the executive arm even for the efficiency of its judgments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There are many men here in this House of Representatives who have sat upon the bench, and I know that these quotations from statesmen and jurists who are revered by all who have read, construed, and practiced law must have a profound influence, not only upon the minds of lawyers, but upon the minds of all who respect the reasoned conclusions of men eminent in their professions.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I should like to ask my colleague whether he thinks the legislature could pass an act recalling judges; and if not, why not?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is a very difficult question to discuss within the time at my disposal. But I will say by way of preface that certainly, with a constitutional prohibition against the recall of judges, such a statute could not be enacted, and therefore I am in favor of requiring an amendment to the Arizona constitution.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I will say that in our own State of Michigan our constitution provides for the initiative and referendum as to constitutional amendments, and it provides for amending the constitution in the provision for initiative and referendum. It can change the three departments of the State government in every particular. One of those is the executive. That is as important as the judiciary. The legislature is another, and that is as important as the judiciary. They are all republican.

The constitution says that the terms of our supreme court judges shall be fixed as provided by law, but the terms of the circuit judges are fixed in the constitution at six years, and the terms of the probate judges and of justices of the peace are also fixed by the constitution. Now, if the terms of the supreme court judges are to be fixed as provided by law, what is there to prevent the legislature from enacting a law at their first session to recall the judges, unless the constitution expressly prohibits doing it?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. As I remember our constitution of 1909 we provide that an amendment to it may be proposed by two-thirds of the legislature. That is one way.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Next, an amendment to the constitution may be proposed by a petition signed by 20 per cent of the qualified voters, and upon this petition the legislature may exercise a veto or may take other action prescribed in the constitution.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Yes; and there is one other which I will suggest, with my colleague's consent.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. That when there is a petition for a change in our constitution—that is, for the referendum—a majority of the legislature in joint session may submit a substitute or alternative, which is just as important as the original article.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That gets down to fundamentals. I will try to answer that as briefly as possible, although it is a very large question.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I am very much interested indeed in the gentleman's able discussion of this question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, states the law. I will read from pages 41 and 42 of the sixth edition of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations:

In regard to the formation and amendment of State constitutions the following appear to be settled principles of American constitutional law:

1. The people of the several Territories may form for themselves State constitutions whenever enabling acts for that purpose are passed by Congress, but only in the manner allowed by such enabling acts and through the action of such persons as the enabling acts shall clothe with the elective franchise to that end.

* * * * * * *

There are always in these cases questions of policy as well as of constitutional law to be determined by the Congress before admission becomes a matter of right—whether the constitution formed is republican, whether suitable and proper State boundaries have been fixed upon, whether the population is sufficient, whether the proper qualifications for the exercise of the elective franchise have been agreed to——

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman states as to the referendum and initiative——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. My friend from Michigan stated that in relation to the provision for amendment to the Michigan constitution.

Mr. TRIBBLE. But suppose your State should have the recall provision, do you think the Congress of the United States would interfere with your State?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am coming to that question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I think I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But the gentleman must first allow me to lay my premises. I will try to answer the gentleman, although he has asked a pretty big question.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he has any idea of admitting that the power of the legislature and the people to change the law of their State, the organic law, as to the terms of judges is in any way related to the recall of a particular judge?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; but the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Georgia do not mean that. That is not what they are driving at. I think I understand fully what the two gentlemen have in mind, and it is an important question. Let me finish this quotation from Cooley—whether any inveterate evil exists in the Territory which is now subject to control, but which might be perpetuated under a State government—these and the like questions, in which the whole country is interested, can not be finally solved by the people of the Territory for themselves, but the final decision must rest with Congress and the judgment must be favorable before admission can be claimed or expected.

11. In the original States and all others subsequently admitted to the Union the power to amend or revise their constitutions resides in the great body of the people as an organized body politic who, being vested with ultimate sovereignty and the source of all State authority, have power to control or alter at will the law which they have made.

Now, to get at the proposition which the gentleman has put forward. A constitution must be republican in form. It goes back to Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, where it is said that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." That obligation of the Federal Government to guarantee a republican form of government is a continuing obligation.

Now, in the law books there is a great deal of discussion as to what constitutes a republican form of government. If I should undertake to discuss that it would take too long. But I simply propose to say that according to the definitions of Madison and Calhoun and according to the definitions of law writers generally a republican form of government is a representative form of government. It is argued that when the framers of the Constitution provided that the United States should guarantee to every State a republican form of government they had in mind the republican form of government which then existed in the original States. Now, when a Territory comes up for admission with a constitution which is not republican in form it is elementary that we must not admit it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am going further; and it is elementary that we may annex other conditions than that the constitution shall be republican in form. Now, what my friend from Michigan had in mind, and what I take it the gentleman from Georgia has in mind, is whether, the legislature having the power to submit a constitutional amendment to the people and the people having voted upon and agreed to that constitutional amendment, and it having been found that that amendment embodies a proposition which is not republican in form, what then happens? That is the precise question. Now, it is said somewhere that when that happens it practically constitutes revolution.

I have it here in Cooley (p. 44):

The power of the people to amend or revise their constitutions is limited by the Constitution of the United States in the following particulars:

1. It must not abolish the republican form of government, since such act would be revolutionary in its character and would call for and demand direct intervention on the part of the Government of the United States.

My friend from Michigan inquired as to the possibility of extreme amendments and extreme legislation. That can go on up to a certain limit, but there can be no valid constitutional amendments or no valid legislation as a result of such amendments or otherwise which are unrepublican—that is, unconstitutional.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Here is the point, if I may be permitted: If this Congress could not interfere with another State in adopting a recall act, then why should Congress interfere with these Territories coming in with a recall act?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That involves a question of policy, not a question of power. We can interfere whenever a State incorporates an unrepublican proposition in its constitution; and when a Territory comes here, as in this case, with a constitution having a provision in it which some believe to be unrepublican, and which many of us consider inexpedient, we have the power to say to the people of the Territory proposing that constitution, "We do not approve of that kind of constitution," and state our reasons for it and refuse to approve it, and I am one of those who believe that that makes for the stability and permanency of our Government.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like the gentleman to say whether he thinks if a constitution is republican in form and does not conflict with any of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and conforms to the enabling act under which the constitutional convention which formed it was called, that then a Member of Congress would have a right, because he did not approve of these specific provisions in the constitution, to keep that State out of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. If you say just a Member of Congress——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, I mean a Member of Congress and others—enough to keep it out.

Mr. CONNELL. Whence comes the power by which Congress can go beyond?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, Congress itself has the power.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest in answer to the various questions here that the question of whether we ought to or can are two different propositions. Congress can prevent a State from coming in and can do it without giving any reason whatever, if it wants to; but while that would be a sufficient reason for one man, it might not be a sufficient reason for another man.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have not questioned the power of Congress. Congress is all powerful; but I mean, Would Congress be exercising its constitutional power when it said to a Territory or proposed State whose constitution was republican in form and was not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence and did conform to the enabling act, just because Congress did not approve of some of the provisions of that constitution, that it shall not become a State?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Let me answer the gentleman's suggestion with this concrete illustration: Take the case of Utah. Utah did present a constitution which was republican in form and not repugnant to the Declaration of Independence, but an "inveterate evil" existed in the Territory. Does the gentleman say that Congress should not have the power to control and to say whether these people should come into the Union with that infirmity? That answers the question.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That was in the enabling act, too.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It does not make any difference where it was. That answers the question.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The constitution, which was framed under the laws that recognized the principles of Mormonism at that time, would not have been in conformity with the enabling act.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We enacted fundamental conditions to the admission of Missouri.

Mr. UTTER. Does not the very fact that a State has to get permission from Congress to become a State imply the fact that Congress has the right to name the conditions under which it shall come in?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think there is no doubt as to that. We enacted conditions as to the admission of Nebraska and as to the admission of Michigan. Michigan had a boundary war with Ohio. We imposed conditions as to the admission of Oklahoma, and we must impose boundary conditions as to New Mexico.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to make this suggestion, that it is conceded that there is no appeal from the decision of Congress. That is true of any tribunal that is final and supreme and from which there is no appeal. It can do anything without giving any reason for it, anything over which it has control or gets control, and there is no way to compel it to do otherwise.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am about to close.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will continue his remarks to-morrow morning.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; I would rather not, because I have almost finished, but if the gentlemen prefer, I will print the rest of my argument, although I would rather go on now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was quoting, when I was diverted some time ago, what Hamilton said concerning the powers of the coordinate branches of our Government and his statement that the judiciary has no influence over the sword or the purse, but is "merely judgment."

Mr. NORRIS. The whole speech is a quotation from Hamilton.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. And a Hamilton is making it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Since the judiciary should be "judgment" personified, and since the purity of the judicial ermine and the accuracy of the judicial scales have never been thought to be benefited by forcing a judge to become a politician, can it be that the judiciary would be benefited or that popular confidence in the judiciary would be strengthened by the knowledge that judges held their places subject to ebullitions of public feeling, subject to the machinations of political enemies, subject to the "recall"?

This proposition is justified by its advocates on the ground that judges are the servants of the people.

They are in the sense that they hold a delegated authority to sit in judgment among the people, but they are the servants of all the people; not the servants of the majority alone, but the servants of both the majority and the minority, and must necessarily therefore be independent of both. Indeed, the independence of the judiciary is the only safeguard of the minority.

Justice can not be the servant of men or nations. Justice sits above men and nations, and the judiciary should personify justice and judgment.

A corrupt judge is despicable; a cowardly judge is contemptible.

It is the duty of the judiciary, as Kent says, "to protect the Constitution against the encroachment of party spirit and the tyranny of faction."

The judiciary ought to protect the Constitution and the Constitution ought to protect the judiciary, and the people ought to protect both in order that they themselves may be protected.

But how can the judiciary protect constitutions when the judiciary is not protected in protecting constitutions?

How can constitutions protect the judiciary when constitutions can not protect themselves?

What assurance can be derived from a judicial decision sustaining a constitutional provision when the judicial decision itself—yea, even the Constitution itself—is only a thing of a day?

Will public respect for judges who sit subject to "recall" be increased? Certainly not.

Will gentlemen of greater ability seek judicial places when they can be tried and convicted by public clamor without opportunity to be heard? Certainly not.

Will sensitive men of high ability seek places from which they may be pulled down by inflamed prejudice and their names become a byword and a hissing? Certainly not.

Ah, you say history will vindicate them. It may be. A good many monuments have been erected to martyrs out of the stones wherewith they were stoned. But what do dead men care for monuments?

Humanity thinks it does well sometimes when in its sober senses it apologizes to the remains of those whom it has hounded to death in its frenzy, and it is well always for the apology to go on file. But what do dead men care for apologies?

Are you Democrats not guilty of indirection in this transaction?

If you believe the recall of judges to be expedient, why do you suggest any amendment to the Arizona constitution?

If you believe the recall of judges to be inexpedient, why do you not make its elimination a condition precedent to the admission of Arizona?

I am opposed to the application of the recall to judges in the Arizona constitution, and I am opposed to the application of the recall to judges everywhere.

I would not destroy the public confidence in the judiciary, and I would keep the judiciary worthy of the public confidence. The recall would weaken both.

In his seventy-fifth year John Marshall became a member of the Virginia constitutional convention of 1829. Party spirit ran high. Among other questions discussed was the question of the tenure of judges, and almost at the end of a life as potent as the life of any man has ever been in the shaping of the destinies of a nation he uttered these words:

> Advert, sir, to the duties of a judge. He has to pass between the government and the man whom that government is prosecuting—between the most powerful individual in the community and the poorest and most unpopular. It is of the last importance that in the performance of these duties he should observe the utmost fairness. Need I press the necessity of this? Does not every man feel that his own personal security and the security of his property depend upon that fairness? The judicial department comes home in its effects to every man's fireside; it passes on his property, his reputation, his life, his all. Is it not in the last degree important that he should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to control him but God and his conscience? I have always thought from my earliest youth till now that the greatest scourge an angry Heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent judiciary.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 14 and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. UNDERHILL was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of serious illness in his family.

CLOSE OF GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on House joint resolution 14 close on Tuesday next at 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that general debate on House joint resolution 14 close next Tuesday at 3 p. m. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 19, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, to whom we are responsible as rational beings, we thank Thee for all the strong, pure, noble, self-respecting men and women who have kept close to Thee and observed the laws which Thou hast ordained, and thus become masters in the art of living godly lives. But we most fervently pray for the poor, weak, insipid men and women who have forgotten Thee and lost all self-respect and become submerged by their own vicious acts and desires to the lowest depths. Have mercy, O God, we beseech Thee, upon them, and teach the strong how to impart strength unto the weak, the pure how to impart purity unto the impure, the godly how to impart godliness unto the ungodly. We realize that the laws enacted by men may restrict, restrain, but they do not remove the disease. This must be done by personal contact, through sympathy, by the power and influence of love. Help us thus to rid ourselves of the cesspools and slums of our city, and all cities, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

S. 144. An act to legalize a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, in Stevens County, Wash.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ARMY SHOE CONTRACTS.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following House resolution (H. Rept. 37):

House resolution 133.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the House of Representatives full information, as follows, with regard to certain statements made by Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, of Pennsylvania, in the House on April 25, 1911:

First. What proportion of the contracts for Army shoes during the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co.?

Second. What are the names of the individuals or firms who have secured contracts for Army shoes in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911? What was the amount of each contract?

Third. Have any competitors been blacklisted or disqualified from bidding on any Army shoe contract in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911? If so, what were the names of those competitors and what was the cause of their disqualification?

Fourth. What proportion of the Army shoe contracts in the fiscal years 1909, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the lowest bidders?

Fifth. How many bidders were there for the last Army shoe contract?

Sixth. Is Shrewsbury leather required in the specifications for Army shoes?

Seventh. Did the War Department institute a test between Shrewsbury leather and Calumet leather? If so, was it found that Calumet leather was better?

Also the following committee amendments were read:

In line 2, page 1, strike out the word "requested" and insert the word "directed."

In the same line, strike out the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

On page 1, in lines 8 and 9, strike out "and nine, nineteen hundred and ten," and insert the word "one."

Mr. HAY. The latter amendment is to carry the inquiry back to 1901.

Mr. MANN. Will not the Clerk report it as it would read as amended?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

What proportion of the contracts for Army shoes during the fiscal years 1901, 1910, and 1911 were awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co.?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that the amendment will only cover the three years of 1901, 1910, and 1911.

Mr. HAY. It should have read "1901 to 1911, inclusive." Therefore I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "eleven" the word "inclusive," so as to take in all of those years.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman make it read "1901 to 1910, inclusive"?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Ought not the same amendment be made on line 13?

Mr. MANN. It occurs several times in the resolution. As to the resolution that was just adopted, where the first paragraph, headed "First," was made to read from 1901 to 1910, I desire to ask the gentleman whether he wishes the same amendment in the second, third, and fourth paragraphs?

Mr. HAY. I do, Mr. Speaker. I have not had my attention called to the fact that the years were repeated in each one of these paragraphs, and I therefore move that the Clerk be instructed to amend the resolution so as to read in each paragraph "from 1901 to 1910, inclusive."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, that also occurs on page 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has already called attention to the fact that that occurs there, too. The amendment includes that. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

ARMY SHOE CONTRACTS.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 152 (H. Rept. 36).

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the House of Representatives full information relative to certain statements made in the House on April 25, 1911, by Hon. ROBERT E. DIFENDERFER, a Member from the State of Pennsylvania, said information to cover the following facts, since the beginning of the fiscal year 1901:

First. The names of individuals or firms who have secured contracts for Army shoes and the amount of each contract in each fiscal year.

Second. What proportion of said contracts was awarded to the firm of Hermann & Co., of Massachusetts.

Third. Whether any competitors have been blacklisted or disqualified from bidding on any Army shoe contract in any such fiscal year; if so, the name of such competitors and the alleged causes for said disqualification or blacklisting.

Fourth. What proportion of said Army shoe contracts have been awarded to the lowest bidders.

Fifth. Whether any of the specifications for such Army shoe contracts in any fiscal year since 1901 stipulated any particular make of leather; if so, what.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 2, strike out the word "requested" and insert the word "directed."

On page 1, line 2, strike out the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

The SPEAKER. The vote is first on the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, they will be considered in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote now recurs on the adoption of the amended resolution.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, has the previous question been ordered on this?

Mr. HAY. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker. Does the gentleman want some time?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I would like to have some time. I have just come in, this second, and I was unaware of the situation.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that the only question is as to the time covered by the resolution.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Which resolution?

Mr. MANN. We have already passed the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. HAY. We have already passed the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amended resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, as to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there have been two reports submitted to the House on this resolution, one by the majority and one by the minority. Those reports show the difference of opinion between the Democratic Members and the Republican Members, and the difference follows the lines which have differentiated the doctrines of these two parties from the beginning.

The Democratic Members, in the majority report, insist upon the admission of these Territories, proceeding upon the theory that the people are entitled to frame such constitutions as in their opinion are best suited to their needs, believing, as we have always believed, in local self-government.

The Republicans, on the contrary, have submitted a report which forbids the admission of Arizona unless she will agree to change her constitution to suit the ideas and the views of this Congress. Under the enabling act Arizona and New Mexico will come in when their constitutions are approved by Congress and the President; or if they are approved by the President, and Congress fails to disapprove, then they come in; but the present situation is this, that the President has approved the constitution of New Mexico, but has failed to act at all as to the constitution of Arizona. So that if Congress fails to act at all, New Mexico will come in and Arizona will stay out.

The report of the majority of the committee is in effect a disapproval of both constitutions. That is, it accepts both constitutions with a condition precedent, and that is that the people of New Mexico shall vote upon an amendment to their constitution, which, if adopted, will render it more easily amendable in the future, and in Arizona to give the people an opportunity to vote further upon the proposition of the recall of judges.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand that New Mexico will come in as a State by reason of the approval of its constitution by the President if no action is taken by this House on this joint resolution. Suppose that both Houses of Congress pass this joint resolution. What effect will that have upon New Mexico? Can not New Mexico fail to act under this joint resolution and come in anyhow, by virtue of the approval of the President, if Congress does not pass affirmative action outside of this resolution disapproving the constitution?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think not. I think if Congress passes this resolution it will operate as a disapproval of the New Mexico constitution, and under the terms of the enabling act it can not come in. If the President approves the joint resolution adopted by Congress, then, if both States vote on the proposed amendments as provided for, as they undoubtedly will, both will come in.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire further?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman suppose that Congress, after the President has approved the New Mexico constitution, can avoid the resolution already passed admitting New Mexico?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There has been no resolution already passed admitting New Mexico. There was an enabling act authorizing the people in the Territory to form a constitution and apply for statehood.

Mr. DICKINSON. Can you avoid the enabling act at this late day which requires the President to approve, which he has done, thereby admitting New Mexico if Congress did not dissent?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; I think so. We can admit these States without any enabling act at all. That enabling act had provisions in it which bound the people of the Territories. It had further provisions in it which are an attempt to bind the action of this Congress. In so far as the enabling act of the Sixty-first Congress was an attempt to control the action of the Sixty-second Congress, I think it is a nullity. This Congress can admit those States whether they have complied with the enabling act or not. Congress has admitted many States heretofore without any enabling act.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. I agree with the gentleman that Congress could to-day pass a law admitting these States, repealing the enabling act and admitting them at once; but as long as that stands it is the law. Would not the adoption of this resolution in its amended form act as a disapproval of the present constitution?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think so.

Mr. OLMSTED. And thus delay the admission of New Mexico as a State?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It would not delay it one day, for this reason, that the enabling act provides that after their constitution has been approved by the President and Congress there shall be an election held at which State officers shall be chosen, and that the result of that election shall be certified to the President.

Upon the receipt of that certificate the President shall proclaim the admission of the State into the Union. Under the provisions of this resolution, at the same election held on the same day that it would be held under the enabling act, the people vote upon the proposition to amend the constitution. Whether they vote "aye" or vote "no," as soon as the result is ascertained and certified to the President he issues the proclamation admitting the State to statehood.

Mr. OLMSTED. Not if they vote "no."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; if they vote either way.

Mr. OLMSTED. If they vote "no" they do not become a State.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken. The resolution provides that whether they vote "aye" or vote "no" they shall be admitted. The minority, or rather a majority of the minority, submit a report, and I suppose they will offer an amendment at the proper time which makes a condition precedent to the admission of Arizona that they shall vote "aye" on the proposition, but that is not the provision of the resolution.

The resolution provides that they shall be admitted whether they vote "aye" or vote "no," because we proceed on the theory that it is a matter properly left to those people to determine what kind of a constitution they want, and that Congress has no right, although it may have the power, to decide what constitution they shall have.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. KENDALL. The majority resolution simply provides that the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona shall each hold another election, at which there shall be submitted to the electors of these Territories the propriety of amending the constitution that they have heretofore ratified, and whether they vote to amend or reject the proposed amendments they are still admitted into the Union, irrespective of the vote?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. That election is to be held at the same time as the election for State officials?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes, at the same time; and the statement in the minority report that it will work delay in the case of New Mexico is not founded on fact. She will come in exactly on the same day that she would come in under the enabling act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had originally intended to discuss the conditions in New Mexico and Arizona in an effort to demonstrate to the House that they are entitled to statehood, but the debate has taken a different course. Nobody seems to question the fact that they have the territorial area, that they have the population in numbers, and that they have the population in character that would entitle them to admission.

Heretofore they have been kept out, and the responsibility for it rests upon the Republican side of the House. They have been kept out of the Union not because they had an insufficient territorial area, not because they had population insufficient in numbers, but because that side of the House, the Republican side, did not have faith in the character of the people there and did not believe that they were capable of self-government. I do not believe that any other conclusion can be drawn from the history of the application of these Territories for admission in this House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. May I ask how long the conditions of their fitness to statehood have existed?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My opinion is that that condition has existed ever since the Territory of New Mexico was added to the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Can the gentleman tell why the Territory of New Mexico was not admitted as a State when the Democratic party had undisputed control of both branches of Congress and of the Executive?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No. I can state that there never has been a time when a Democratic House has refused to pass a resolution admitting New Mexico as a State into the Union. Since the Civil War the Democratic Party has had control of the three branches of the Government for two years, and two years only. But during the past 16 years the Republican Party has had control of this end of the Capitol and of the Senate and of the White House, and during all those 16 years these Territories have applied for statehood, and during all that time they have been qualified for statehood, and during all that time other Territories with less population have been admitted into the Union by that side of the House, but these Territories have been rejected. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I call upon the gentleman, if he can, to give any other reason why they have been kept out, except that, in the opinion of the Republican Party, the character of the people was not such as to justify their coming into the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I assume the gentleman would not object to naming the Territory that has been admitted with a less population in the last 16 years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What Territory was admitted that had a less population?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, I will name to the gentleman the Territories that have been admitted since the Republican Party has been in power, and I will give the population of each for a number of years back.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I mean within the last 16 years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In 1860, for instance, the Territory——

Mr. CAMPBELL. This was the statement made—for the last 16 years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will give it to the gentleman during the entire time that the Republican Party has been in power. You have been in power for 16 years and you have kept these Territories out. You have admitted other Territories with less population and with less territorial area. The Republican Party has——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Within the last 16 years?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; but you have kept these out within the last 16 years, when you have been in absolute control, and while you were in absolute control prior to that time you admitted the other Territories——

Mr. CAMPBELL rose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, if the gentleman will possess his soul in patience, I will give him the figures. In 1864, for instance. Under the census of 1860 Nevada had a population of 6,857, and the same year New Mexico had 93,000. In 1870 Nevada had 42,000. In the same year New Mexico had 91,000. In 1864—I give the figures for 1860 and 1870 because there was no census for 1864—in 1864 Nevada was admitted as a State.

In 1889 Montana was admitted with 142,000, and the same year New Mexico had a population of 160,000. In 1890 Idaho was admitted with 88,000 and Wyoming was admitted with 60,000, and at the same time New Mexico had a population of 195,000, and at that same time Arizona had a population of 122,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman has failed to give a single case where the Republican Party admitted a State in the last 16 years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Because the Republican Party has been in power; that is why. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is for the very reason that I state. I can not state that they have been admitted, because the Republican Party was in power and refused to admit them; but you yoked New Mexico and Arizona together against their will in a resolution admitting them as one State. Let me tell you something else you did. In order to bribe the people of Arizona to accept that condition you inserted a provision in your resolution that they would be given $5,000,000 cash for a school fund if they would accept the terms which you imposed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. But the gentleman stated that the Republican Party had been admitting States within the last 16 years with a less population than Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; the gentleman did not. The gentleman said the Republican Party had been admitting States into the Union with less population than New Mexico and Arizona, but that during the past 16 years it had kept these two States out, and the only reason you can give for it is that you did not think the character of the population would justify their admission.

This, Mr. Chairman, has been the objection which has always been made to the admission of States located outside the territory of the original States.

In 1811, when the bill for the admission of the State of Louisiana came before the House, Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, in a speech opposing the admission, among other things, said:

> It was not for these men that our fathers fought. It was not for them this Constitution was adopted. You have no authority to throw the rights and liberties and properties of this people into hotch-pot with the wild men on the Missouri, nor with the mixed, though more respectable, race of Anglo-Hispano-Gallo-Americans who basks on the sand in the mouth of the Mississippi.

In 1843, when the bill for the settlement of the Oregon Territory came before the Senate, the wild men on the Missouri seem to have taken a step forward in the opinion of the statesmen of the older States, and in discussing that question Senator McDuffie, of South Carolina, then said:

> Why, sir, of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not for that purpose give a pinch of snuff for the whole Territory. I wish to God we did not own it. I wish it was an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others. This is the character of that country. Who are we to send there? Do you think your honest farmers in Pennsylvania, New York, or even Ohio or Missouri, will abandon their farms to go upon any such enterprise? God forbid.

In opposing the same measure, Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, said:

> We have not adopted the system of colonization, and it is to be hoped we never shall. Oregon can never be one of the United States. If we extend our laws to it, we must consider it as a colony. Is the Territory of Oregon ever to become a State, a member of the Union? Never. The Union is already too extensive.

And again, in 1848, in a speech in the Senate, Mr. Webster said:

> I have never heard of anything, I can not conceive of anything, in itself more absurd and more affrontive to all sober judgment. Mexico and California are not worth one dollar.

I wonder with what emotions the shade of that great statesman contemplated the action of this House last winter, when, in making preparation for the celebration and glorification of the completion of the Panama Canal, we decided to hold the great exposition in the city of San Francisco.

"Mexico and California are not worth one dollar," so thought the great expounder. Let us see. In New Mexico to-day the taxable values now amount to $300,000,000. In addition, there are 400 miles of railroads now untaxed but soon to be, and, according to the estimate of the Geological Survey, 9,000,000,000 tons of coal. There are school buildings valued at a million dollars and a hundred thousand school children, 10 daily and 100 weekly papers, 41 national banks, 34 Territorial banks, and 3,000 miles of railroad.

In Arizona the taxable values equal $450,000,000, schools and public buildings $1,000,000, 33 Territorial and 13 national banks, live stock valued at $18,000,000, and 1,900 miles of railroads.

So much for the material development of the Territories that would not be worth one dollar.

In area New Mexico has 122,000 square miles; Arizona, 112,000 square miles; and New England, including New York and New Jersey, has 124,000 square miles.

If any rule as to the population requirement has ever been adopted, I think I can say safely that that rule has been that when a Territory has sufficient area and a population equal to that fixed by the apportionment as entitling a State to one Representative in Congress. Under the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory it was provided that the States to be formed out of that great Territory should be admitted when they had a population of 60,000. In obedience to this requirement Illinois was admitted with 55,000; Kentucky, with 73,000; Louisiana, with 76,000; Mississippi, with 75,000; Missouri, with 66,000; and Ohio, with 45,000. And so I repeat that the only reason the Republican Party has refused admission to New Mexico and Arizona, in view of the fact that they have all along had the requisite population and the requisite territorial area, is that they have had no faith in the character of the people of those Territories and in their capacity for self-government.

There is nothing in the history of these people to justify any such position. The very common opinion entertained by the people east of the Mississippi River is that the people of New Mexico and Arizona are emigrants from old Mexico, and they regard them in the light of Mexican peons. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Spanish-American citizens of New Mexico are descended from a very noble race. They are not Mexicans in race, in sympathy, or in civilization. Their ancestors came to New Mexico direct from Spain, and they have no connection by blood or political affiliations with old Mexico.

When the first explorers reached New Mexico, they found a tribe of Indians far advanced in the arts of civilization. They lived in towns, they cultivated their fields, and were dressed in clothes made of cotton cloth. It was thought by these first explorers that that country was rich in mineral wealth, and so this first discoverer wrote back to the home Government of Spain, "I have discovered a new Mexico." Colonists were sent out from Spain to settle this new Mexico, and it became and remained a Province of Spain, as distinct from the Province of Mexico as it was from any other Spanish colonies upon the face of the earth. As a matter of fact, they were separated from the people and Government of old Mexico by hundreds of miles of trackless desert. They maintained their civilization, they reared a race of pure Castilian blood, and they are and have a right to be as proud of their lineage as any other Caucasians in any other State of this Union. They are not Mexicans, and they naturally and properly resent the treatment they have had by the citizens of the other States of this Union, who have unconsciously and ignorantly affronted them in their literature and in their political treatment of them.

When the Mexican revolution ended successfully in 1821 and the authority of Spain was put an end to, the Government of old Mexico sent a governor to New Mexico, and then, and not until then, were they brought under the authority or bore any political relation to that Government. For 300 years they have maintained their civilization, and before the settlement at Jamestown they had built their schoolhouses and erected their temples of worship.

In 1846, when war was declared with Mexico, Gen. Kearney, commanding the American forces, was received with open arms by the people of New Mexico, and he promised them then that they would be taken into the Union of States and guaranteed all the rights and privileges of American citizens. Under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo it was again solemnly agreed that these people should be admitted as citizens of the United States and receive and enjoy all the rights of that citizenship according to the principles of the Constitution of the United States. This same guarantee was given them under the treaty of Gadsden, and again in the compact with Texas.

Relying upon the good faith of the United States, they applied for statehood in 1851, and President Taylor sent a message to Congress urging that they be given it. At every Congress since that time they have stood at the door and knocked, but it has never yet been opened to them. Other Territories with less population, with less territorial area, with less industrial development have been admitted on their borders, but these more fortunate Territories were peopled by emigrants from the older States, and so those people believed, and so they had a right to believe, and I believe and charge that the only reason they have been denied admission to the Union was because the Republican Party, which has been in power in this country, with the exception of two short years, for the past half century and more, did not believe that in character and qualifications for self-government they were capable of maintaining the institutions of a State.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman why the Democratic Party did not admit these States when it had the power during previous administrations.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. WARBURTON. Why was it the Democratic Party did not admit these States when it had the power to do so?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Democratic Party had power two years since the war, and in those two years it failed to admit them, and when it failed to admit them it did wrong. The great trouble with the Republican Party to-day is that they follow the Democratic precedent when it is wrong, but never follow it when it is right. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. But it is never right.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If the failure to admit these Territories during the last 16 years excludes the Republican Party from indorsement, then the failure to admit these Territories during the period that existed between the 4th of March, 1893, and the 4th of March, 1895, when the Democratic Party had a full majority in the House and in the Senate, and the Democratic President was in the White House, with three sessions of Congress during that time, ought to exclude the Democratic Party from proper indorsement. In other words, I suppose the gentleman claims that the baby was such a small one for those two years that it ought not to put the Democratic Party out of the pale of social, if not voting, approval.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; the gentleman claims this, that there was another baby at that time that was so great a baby that had come to the Democratic Party through the mismanagement and the malfeasance of the Republican Party in power for years before that, whereby the burdens upon the people were so great and overwhelming, that it took all of the time of the party trying to take care of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me further, receiving so much applause from his party friends—and I always like to join in applause of the estimable gentleman from Mississippi—does the gentleman, or does his party, look with pride upon the wonderful accomplishments during the years of 1893 to 1895, when you had full power? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman's party looks not with pride upon all that happened then. The gentleman's party looks with pride upon the fact, however, that the Democratic Party since that time has consistently and continually fought the policies of the Republican Party, which had brought this country to the condition it was found in when the Democratic Party assumed power in 1893, and I am thankful to God that the verdict rendered last November shows that the people have at last come to the conclusion that we are right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to go on and discuss this matter, with no intention, of course, to be discourteous to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, my friend. We have had this matter about 1893 thrashed out here until it is threadbare, and is, to use an expression of a distinguished gentleman of this country, "worn to a frazzle."

The question is of admitting the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico to-day, and the Democratic Party to-day stands for their admission with the constitutions which they have provided, without the delay of a single minute. Does the gentleman and his party stand for the same thing to-day?

Mr. CANNON. I am for the admission of New Mexico, as the gentleman was for its admission in the last session last winter of the Sixty-first Congress, when, with this constitution, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," it received the approval unanimously of the House; and I am of the same opinion still.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am, too. Now, is the gentleman in favor of the admission of Arizona?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman vote that way?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will; but will that side of the House vote to admit the State of New Mexico with the constitution she has now, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," and vote to admit the State of Arizona without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t"? Will the gentleman and his party do that?

Mr. CANNON. I will treat each Territory [laughter on the Democratic side] in the matter of statehood upon its respective merits, and will vote, as the gentleman and his party voted, to admit New Mexico; and if I vote against admitting Arizona, for good reasons, when we come to the separate measure for Arizona, I will take the responsibility for my vote. Is the gentleman willing to take the responsibility for his vote if New Mexico is not admitted?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman will take all the responsibility that can be put upon him. The Democratic Party has no desire to shirk it. The Democratic Party lays no log across the road of New Mexico. If the people of New Mexico come into this Union according to the provisions of this resolution, they will come in exactly the same day as they would come if the conditions proposed in the pending resolution were stricken out.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I take it that we need have very little difficulty about New Mexico, and what I want to ask the gentleman particularly is this—the gentleman may have covered it in his remarks, because I did not hear the beginning of his remarks: Does the gentleman favor the abrogation of the recall of judges as provided for in the Arizona constitution?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, we will get to that in a moment.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I did not know but what the gentleman might have covered that. That is really the difficulty, I take it, of Members on both sides of this House, and there really ought not to be any partisan question involved here at all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; I have no doubt the Republican Party believe that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Well, I reckon you believe it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think there has been partisanship all the way through.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I mean there ought not to be any partisanship on this question of the recall of judges. It is not a partisan question.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Not at all.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And really that is the only question involved here.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. In my opinion, that is not the only question involved. Whether I favor the recall of judges or whether I do not, my opinion is immaterial. I do not think it is up to this Congress to determine that question for the people of Arizona. I believe the people of Arizona have a perfect right to provide in their constitution that judges may be recalled by the people and still the Territory be entitled to admission into this Union.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I make another suggestion? The gentleman and I have always reasoned pretty freely and frankly on these questions. The reason, as it appears to me, is this: Now, that this question is presented to the Congress of the United States, we, as the Congress of the United States, ought to set the mark of our disapproval on the recall of judges, if we do disapprove of it, and if we do not disapprove, then we ought to deliberately say we do approve. If as lawyers, if as Representatives. we believe in the recall of judges, why, then, let us say so, and if we do not, then let us say we do not. It is up to us now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That has been the position of the gentleman's party from the beginning, and I think he is entirely consistent.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It is not a question of party.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is a question of party. The position of the Republican Party is that it is the duty of the Federal Government to determine for the people in the States the kind of government they ought to have. The Democratic position is just the contrary, and that it is the right of the people in the various States to establish such governments as, in their opinion, are best suited to their conditions; and that is the position here to-day, and that is the issue drawn by the two reports now filed. The Democratic Party says that it is in favor of the admission of these Territories with the constitutions as they stand to-day.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that his party is in favor of letting the people of a Territory make their own constitution. Now, the gentleman would not carry that so far as to say that he would be in favor of letting the people of a Territory adopt a constitution which might approve the practice of polygamy?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman says this, and now, speaking for my single self——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is the way I like to hear the gentleman talk.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi (continuing). I believe the people of these Territories have a right to come into the Union provided they have a constitution that is republican in form and does not violate the provisions of the enabling act, and I do not believe that the recall of judges renders the constitution unrepublican in form. Now, that is what I believe.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It was not forbidden by the enabling act.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It was not forbidden by the enabling act as suggested by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman will permit me just a second, the enabling act does require or provide for the approval of the constitution by Congress. Now, if we approve of the constitution containing a provision for the recall of judges, then we approve that provision along with the rest of the constitution.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That applied to the Sixty-first Congress. That Congress can not put any limitations upon the powers of the Sixty-second Congress. The Sixty-first Congress said that they would not admit these Territories as States until they approved of their constitutions. The Sixty-second Congress says, "We will admit these States with the constitutions they have, without reference to whether we approve them or disapprove them; and the Sixty-first Congress had no power to bind us in that regard."

Mr. OLMSTED. I admit that the Sixty-second Congress can repeal any act the Sixty-first Congress passed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. We do not have to repeal it, nor have we repealed any of the conditions which were fixed in the enabling act. The Sixty-first Congress was utterly without power to bind us. We can admit these States without any enabling act. States have come into this Union without any enabling acts and without any constitutions.

Mr. OLMSTED. Let me ask one more question, in order that I may understand the gentleman's position. Does he intend to vote for this substitute resolution recommended by the majority of the Committee on the Territories, or does he propose to vote for the resolution in its original form?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I propose to vote for the resolution in its original form.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question of the recall of judges——

Mr. OLMSTED. Just one word. That resolution does provide, in its original form, and requires us to say, that we approve of that constitution. If we do not approve of the recall of judges we can not conscientiously vote for the original resolution, because to so vote would be to approve of that Arizona constitution, which does contain a provision for the recall of judges——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Which does the gentleman call the "original resolution"?

Mr. OLMSTED. The one introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Territories, House joint resolution 14.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can just draw whatever conclusion his mind will lead him to on that question.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman from Mississippi has been very generous in submitting to interruptions, and I want to ask him a question or two for information. The original resolution introduced by the gentleman from Virginia and referred to the Committee on Territories provided for the admission of both these Territories and the approval of the constitutions, which had been previously ratified by their people.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not hear him.

Mr. KENDALL. I say, the original resolution, introduced by the gentleman from Virginia and referred to the Committee on Territories, provided for the admission of both these Territories and for the approval of the constitutions which had been previously ratified by the people of those Territories.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Now, the committee proposes an amendment by which these Territories are to be admitted after an election shall have been held, at which these same constitutions, with certain amendments, shall be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. But in any event, whether the people shall approve or reject the amendments proposed in this resolution, the Territories are to be admitted into the Union. Do I understand that the gentleman proposes to ignore the recommendations of the majority of the committee and vote against the amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I misapprehended the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] when he referred to the "original" resolution. I intend to vote for the resolution as reported from the committee.

Mr. KENDALL. For the substitute?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; on condition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes more to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. KENDALL. Let me inquire of the gentleman what the condition amounts to; if, whether or not it is complied with, the Territories enter the Union just the same?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It amounts to a good deal, I think. It gives to the people of that Territory the right to vote on the proposition again, and there are a great many people in that Territory who insist that they would like to have an opportunity to vote upon this proposition. As it was submitted to them they accepted it, because, as some of them said, the people were crazy to be admitted to the Union and they would have accepted anything, and I can understand how they should be. Those Territories have been ruled from Washington. They have been administered from Washington. Their officers have been appointed from Washington. They have had, in a mild form, as one of my friends here suggests, a carpet-bag government, and I can understand how any people who live out in the Territories of the United States, where their affairs are governed from Washington, 1,000 or 2,000 miles away, would be willing to accept almost any constitution presented to them in order to escape from that condition and have self-government.

A very high official of this Government is reported to have said recently that the people of Arizona would have voted for that constitution if it had contained a provision that would have established such government as Kipling tells us lies "somewhere east of Suez, where the best is like the worst and there aren't no Ten Commandments" [laughter], and I can readily understand how they feel.

Mr. Chairman, the question here is raised sharply by the two reports, whether or not the recall of judges renders this constitution republican in form. Before taking that matter up, I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, I am utterly opposed to the recall of judges. I am opposed to the recall of any officers, and I am also opposed to short terms for officers. I was one of those who voted in this House five or six years ago in favor of making the term of Congressmen four years, and I would vote again for that proposition. I do not believe there is anything in the history of this country, and, so far as my limited investigation has gone, there is nothing in the history of other countries, that would justify this turning to the recall of judges. The judges I have in mind, whose names have come down to us in the history of the world, connected with infamy and held in execration were judges who were subject to recall. Pontius Pilate did not deliver up the Innocent One to be crucified until the mob reminded him that "we are friends of Cæsar."

I do not believe any brighter chapter in the history of this Republic will ever be written than the chapter which tells the story of the judiciary of these United States. [Applause.] I have never yet done it, and I do not believe the day will come when I shall go on the stump or rise in my place on this floor and assail in unmeasured terms the judiciary of this country. And I do not believe, with all due respect to everybody else, that those who do preach to the people the doctrine that our courts are corrupt or that they are subject to improper influences and that their opinions are directed by special interests are serving their country well or are the best friends of liberty. [Applause.]

A few days ago a distinguished gentleman of this country, whose star has recently risen above the horizon, but which in my opinion is destined at no distant date to become the brightest luminary in our political firmament, expressed my views on the subject of the recall of judges so clearly that I will quote what he says. I read from a speech of Gov. Woodrow Wilson, recently delivered in Kansas City:

The recall is a means of administrative control. If properly regulated and devised, it is a means of restoring to administrative officials what the initiative and referendum restore to legislators, namely, a sense of direct responsibility to the people who choose them.

The recall of judges is another matter. Judges are not lawmakers. They are not administrators. Their duty is not to determine what the law shall be, but to determine what the law is. Their independence, their sense of dignity and of freedom, is of the first consequence to the stability of the State. To apply to them the principle of the recall is to set up the idea that determinations of what the law is must respond to popular impulse and to popular judgment.

It is sufficient that the people should have the power to change the law when they will. It is not necessary that they should directly influence by threat of recall those who merely interpret the law already established. The importance and desirability of the recall as a means of administrative control ought not to be obscured by drawing it into this other and very different field.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit me just one question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman ever heard anybody denounce the judiciary of this country in unmeasured terms?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I have.

Mr. HARDY. The whole judiciary?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. They did not except anybody particularly.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has heard something I have never heard in my life.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, that is remarkable, but nevertheless true.

Mr. KENDALL. Is the gentleman in favor of appointive judges?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am. I think our actions outside of this Chamber frequently speak louder than our words in this Chamber. The proposition was submitted in the State of Mississippi at the State election last November to change from the present system of appointing judges to the system of electing the judges by the people and I voted against the change.

Mr. KENDALL. Did the proposition carry or not?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is a very hard question to answer. It got the votes, but the question is whether it is going to be inserted in the constitution. It is claimed by some very good lawyers that it was not submitted as it should have been.

Mr. KENDALL. It got a majority of the votes in favor of the amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; there was an overwhelming majority of the votes in favor of the amendment, I am sorry to say, and I was left then, as I have frequently been on other occasions, in the minority.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to this recall of judges. As I understand the argument of the gentlemen on the other side, it is that the fact that the judges may be recalled by popular vote renders this constitution unrepublican in form, and to that proposition I should like to address myself for a few moments.

I do not believe any gentleman will contend that if the recall of officers is permissible, and still the Government be republican in form, that the mere fact of the recall of the judges will render it unrepublican. I believe this to be true, and I think no lawyer here will take issue with me, that if any State in this Union has a constitution which is substantially the form of the constitutions of the original States that then it is republican in form.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in fact, has said this very thing. In Twenty-first Wallace, page 162, in discussing the guaranty clause of the Constitution, the court said:

All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. These governments the Constitution did not change. They are accepted precisely as they were, and it is therefore to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.

I shall call your attention very briefly to some of the provisions in the constitutions of the original States on this particular question.

Mr. WARBURTON. I understand the gentleman to say that this side are all opposed to the constitution as provided for Arizona.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no; I did not intend to say that. I said the opposition to the constitution of Arizona had come from that side.

Mr. WARBURTON. Personally, I am in favor of admitting her without any further conditions.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am glad to hear that, and I understand there are a number of gentlemen on that side who are, but the minority report was submitted, as the gentleman understands, by members of his party, and the speeches that have so far been made in opposition were from that side of the House.

Now, the declaration that "all political power is vested in and derived from the people only" is in the bill of rights of nearly all the States, and I insist, therefore, that if the people have the right to delegate to the legislature the power to recall judges, the people themselves must necessarily have that power, or else they could not have delegated it to the legislature.

When the old articles of confederation were in existence before the "more perfect union" was formed, this provision appeared in them:

ART. 5. For the more convenient management of the general interest of the United States, Delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its Delegates or any of them at any time within the year and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year.

Thomas Jefferson—and I address this remark to this side of the House particularly—in a draft of a constitution which he prepared for the State of Virginia—and I believe that we will all agree that he would not advocate any government that was not republican in form—submitted a draft in which this provision occurred:

Delegates to Congress shall be appointed by joint ballot of both houses of the assembly for a term not exceeding one year, subject to being recalled within the term by joint vote of both said houses.

Now, I will read provisions from some other States. In Massachusetts the bill of rights and the constitution adopted in 1780 contained this provision:

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have the right at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their form of government to cause their public officers—

All of them, not legislative, not executive, not judicial, but all of them—to cause their public officers to return to private life, and to fill vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments.

In their constitution, providing for Delegates to Congress, they say that they "may be recalled at any time within a year."

Now, the New Hampshire bill of rights contains this provision:

A frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of the constitution and a constant adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, industry, frugality, and all the social virtues are indispensably necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and good government. The people ought therefore to have a particular regard to all those principles in the choice of their officers and representatives; and they have a right to require of their lawgivers and magistrates an exact and constant observance of them in the formation and execution of the laws necessary for the good administration of government.

And accordingly, in article 72 of their constitution, they provide that—

All judicial officers shall hold their offices during good behavior, provided, nevertheless, the governor, with consent of the council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the legislature.

The constitution of Texas, 1845, article 4, provided that—

The judges of the supreme and district courts shall be removed by the governor on the address of two-thirds of each house of the legislature for willful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient grounds for impeachment.

Now, if the Legislature of Texas could remove the judge for reasonable cause and when his offending did not consist in willful neglect of duty or misbehavior in office, whence came that power? We all agree, and every State in this Union has incorporated that principle in its bill of rights in one form or another, that the people are the source of all political power. Then, if the people can delegate to the legislature the power to recall a judge for reasonable cause which in itself does not constitute a willful neglect of duty or misbehavior in office, and leave to the legislature to determine what is a reasonable cause, by what process of reasoning do you reach the conclusion that the people themselves could not reserve that power and also recall the judge for what to them seemed reasonable cause?

In Maine—and I suppose we will all agree that the same rule applies to the States which have been admitted to the Union since the formation of the Constitution as applied to the original States—in Maine in 1819 they provided that their judges might be recalled by impeachment, and might further be recalled by an address of both houses of the legislature.

Now, in Maryland; I would like to read the reasons given by the people for their action. It is urged that in order that a judge may be independent—and I think they ought to be—that we should have no recall, and that any act which tends to remove that independence renders the constitution unrepublican in form. Here is what the Maryland people stated in their bill of rights in 1776:

That the independency and uprightness of judges are essential to the impartial administration of justice and a great security to the rights and liberties of the people; whereas the chancellor and judges ought to hold commissions during good behavior; and the said chancellor and judges shall be removed for misbehavior on conviction in a court of law, and may be removed by the governor upon the address of the general assembly: Provided, That two-thirds of all the members of each house concur in such address.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does not the gentleman think that where a man is chosen to a position for life, the position taken by the Maryland Assembly was a correct one, and that that rule should not apply where an officer is elected for a short term of years?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It does apply in various States where the term is for 7, 9, or 15 years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The term of 9 or 15 years is an unusually long term for one to be elected to office in this country.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not think so. I think the judges, as a rule, hold for as long a term as that. In my own State the supreme court judges hold for nine years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The average, however, is much less than that in this country.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But whatever be the theory, my proposition is that the people have the power; and the fact that it was in the constitutions of the States forming the original Union shows that it was not unrepublican, or, as Madison expressed it, it was not antirepublican, and that was the test. It was not that it was unrepublican, but that it was not antirepublican. Now, this same provision goes through the constitutions of a number of the States.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. After reading the constitution of Massachusetts has the gentleman inquired whether or not the people have seen fit or have had occasion to recall any of their judges, and has not that provision worked well for the last 100 years?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand the provision has worked well, because there has been no change in it.

Mr. RAKER. And therefore the judges are of just as high a class there, and render as good opinions, as anywhere in the world.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My opinion is, though I am a very humble member of the legal profession, that the opinions of no court in these United States stand higher than the opinions of the courts in the State of Massachusetts, and there they are chosen for life.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The judges are appointed by the governor for life, are they not, in Massachusetts?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not recall just as to that, but the term is for life. Now, I have a number of authorities here giving a definition of a republican form of government, to which I would like to direct the attention of the House, if I may be permitted to proceed.

Mr. UTTER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman to say that, in his mind, the sole question is the recall. I understand him to say, second, that, so far as the work of Congress is concerned, the sole question is to determine whether the constitution offers a republican form of government, and that he does not consider the recall as contrary to a republican form of government. Therefore, that Congress would not be justified in holding out a State simply because it puts the recall in its constitution. Is that the gentleman's argument?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes. I do not think Congress would be justified; but, of course, I think Congress has the power to keep the State out, because the Constitution says, "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union"; and, of course, Congress can admit them or keep them out, just as Congress has kept these States out. Congress is not called upon to give anybody any reason for it, and I do not think any good reason can be given for it in this particular instance, but Congress has the power, and it also has the power to lay down the terms on which the State may be admitted.

Mr. UTTER. One more question. If Congress admits this State with a recall, does it therefore practically approve of the recall?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, I think not. I am in favor of admitting this State with the recall, but I do not think there is a gentleman on this floor who is more opposed to the recall of judges than I am. I think, however, that is a matter that ought to be left to the people of Arizona, to let them work out their own salvation.

Mr. UTTER. And that we have no right to say with whom we shall travel. In other words, as in the case of a woman who marries a man to reform him, whether he needs reform afterwards or not, she has nothing to say about it. If we accept a State which has a provision in its constitution that we believe is against the common good we thereby approve it, whereas now is our time to say whether or not we shall approve it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, I take it that the gentleman does not approve all of the constitutions of all of the States of this Union, does he?

Mr. UTTER. Oh, certainly not. But when the States come in Congress ought to approve of their constitutions.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Why, the obligation on Congress is to guarantee that their forms of government shall be republican after they are in. Now, the objection which the gentleman offers, as I understand, is not that this is unrepublican in form but that it is undesirable.

Mr. UTTER. Undesirable?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman believes it is republican in form?

Mr. UTTER. I certainly do. I think the power lies in the people to do that if they wish.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then I submit, if it is republican in form, it is none of the business of Congress to attempt to change it for this reason, that as soon as they come in the State will have the power to change it back again. The gentleman in that way will not get rid of the association of an evil State or an evil community. He will still have to associate on terms of absolute equality with the State of Arizona after it comes in if the government is republican in form.

Why, the Supreme Court has decided that on many occasions. In one instance, by a solemn treaty the Government had made with the Indians, the Indians, under the treaty, had a right to go on unoccupied land of the United States and hunt. In Wyoming, after the State was admitted into the Union, the legislature enacted a law prohibiting the Indians from hunting on those unoccupied lands of the United States, and they appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court stated in that case (Ward v. Race Horse) that the State had full power to enact such legislation, and that there is no such thing as inequality among the States in this Union; that we could have no Union here except upon the theory that all the States stood upon a full equality.

Mr. UTTER. I think I understand the gentleman's position exactly, and that is why I asked, because that is where he differs from myself. His position is this: If in his mind the form of constitution is republican, he is not justified in going further. Now, the position I take is that while I admit that form may be republican, still as representing the Congress and therefore representing the other States that join with those States, we have the right to demand something else besides that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, I have the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case, and I will read the language of the court to show the utter futility of any such——

Mr. WILLIS. I want to suggest that the gentleman give the number of the case. I am very much interested in the argument the gentleman is making, and I think it is absolutely correct. What is the case?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.. The case I was about to read is that of Bolln against Nebraska. It is United States Supreme Court Report 176. Now, the court in that case held this:

This court has held in many cases that whatever be the limitations upon the power of a Territorial government they cease to have any operative force except as voluntarily adopted after such Territory has become a State of the Union. Upon the admission of a State it becomes entitled to and possesses all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States and stands upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects, and, again, not only did Congress declare that Nebraska was admitted upon an equal footing with the original States, but the whole Federal system is based upon the fundamental principle of the equality of the States under the Constitution. The idea that one State is debarred while the others are granted the privilege of amending their organic laws to conform to the wishes of their inhabitants is so repugnant to the theory of their equality under the Constitution that it can not be entertained even if Congress had power to make such discrimination.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I suggest to my friend that there is some limitation to it after all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; there is a limitation.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Suppose here is a sovereign State. Its constitution is republican in form when it is admitted. After it is admitted, being a sovereign State, an amendment to the constitution is voted upon by the people which makes its constitution unrepublican in form. Then I think the gentleman will agree with me that the Federal Government has the right to say that practically a revolutionary condition exists.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The theory I was proceeding upon was the statement of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. UTTER] that he believed it was not unrepublican in form. Now, if it is unrepublican in form, then the constitution of Oregon is unrepublican in form, and the obligation which rests upon Congress is not simply to refuse to admit a State where the government provided is not republican in form, but that obligation continues. The words of the Constitution are, "That we guarantee to each State," and it is not the province of the guarantor to create, as Mr. Tucker says in his work on the Constitution, to create—I will read that section. I think it is very interesting.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But it is a continuing duty.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is. It is none of our business to create these governments.

I read from Tucker on the Constitution, 638, as follows:

The word "guarantee" does not mean to form, to establish, to create; it means to warrant, to secure, to protect the State—that is, the body politic—in its right to have a republican form of government. It defends the people against the interference of any foreign power or of any intestine conspiracy against its right as a body politic to establish for itself republican forms of government. To allow the guarantor to take the initiative—

This in answer to the gentleman from Rhode Island—to allow the guarantor to take the initiative, and, under the pretext of duty as its guarantor—

And we have no other duty—to impose a form of government upon the people of a State, would make this clause, intended for protection, an excuse for destructive invasion.

That is the position I take exactly.

Mr. UTTER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. UTTER. There is only one question, which is as to the power of Congress to say on other matters than the unrepublican feature. You take the position that it is only the unrepublican features, as I understand; but it seems to me Congress has not only the duty of saying that, but it has the duty of saying in regard to other things in the constitution.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman and I differ radically in regard to that.

Mr. UTTER. We differ. That is all.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I would like to inquire, for information: In a number of the States the constitution provides for the recall of some of the State officers, and I would like to inquire if the constitution is any more unrepublican in form that provides for the recall of judges than one that provides for the recall of other State officers?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is no distinction, in my opinion, so far as the power of the people to recall their officers goes. The judge is a very high officer, the one who has to stand between the State, frequently, and the citizen; between the rich and the powerful on the one hand and the poor and the helpless on the other. He is the highest functionary of government. But, nevertheless, the judge is an officer of the law. And if a State has the power to recall its officers and remain republican in form, that power extends to the judges as well as to all other branches.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to conclude my remarks without further interruption. I am anxious to present my views on the question as to what is a republican form of government, as contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

In the frame of the Constitution which Mr. Randolph submitted to the Constitutional Convention the clause, which is now section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution, was:

That a republican constitution and its existing laws ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States.

In Madison's journal the following colloquy appears, which I think will be very interesting in the present discussion:

Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought the resolution very objectionable. He should be very unwilling that such laws as exist in Rhode Island should be guaranteed.

Mr. WILSON. The object is merely to secure the States against dangerous commotions, insurrections, and rebellions.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The resolution has two objects—first, to secure a republican government; secondly, to suppress domestic commotions.

He urged the necessity of both these provisions.

Mr. Madison moved to substitute "that the constitutional authority of the States shall be guaranteed respectively against domestic as well as foreign violence. * * *"

Mr. Wilson moved as a better expression of the idea "that a republican form of government shall be guaranteed to each State, and that each State shall be protected against foreign and domestic violence."

This seeming to be well received, Mr. Madison and Mr. Randolph withdrew their propositions, and on the question for agreeing to Mr. Wilson's motion it passed, nem. con.

Adjourned.

Why was this provision included in the Constitution? Madison said, in his letter to the people of New York in the Forty-third Federalist, that the purpose of it was to protect "the system from aristocratic and monarchical innovations," and I believe the history of the struggle which had ended at Yorktown will justify no other conclusion. As stated by him, the experiences of all other people who had gone that way before them taught that in a republican confederacy it was essential that the elements which composed it should also be republican, and in addition to this, all the States were weak.

Virginia, the largest of them all, had only some 700,000 population. They had fought through seven years of the Revolution to establish their independence, and success had come then only through the kindly offices of another great power; and so it was as natural as it was necessary that each of the States should insist that all of the States should bind themselves to guarantee to each the enjoyment of the right for which they had so long struggled, the right to live under a republican form of government.

Since that day many great statesmen have undertaken to give a definition of the words "republican form of government." One of the greatest lawyers who held a seat in that convention of great men was James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and it was he who wrote the article as it was finally agreed upon by the convention. Subsequently he became a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in the famous case of Chisolm against Georgia, reported in Second Dallas, he gave what he thought was a correct definition. At page 457 he says:

As a citizen I know the constitution of that State to be republican, and my short definition of such a government is one constructed on this principle, "that the supreme power resides in the body of the people."

If this definition be the correct one, certainly no one will contend that the people of Arizona have gone beyond the limits set by the Constitution when they retain to themselves the right, to use the expression in the Massachusetts bill of rights, "to cause their public officers to return to private life at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish."

Madison said that the only restriction imposed on the States is that they shall not exchange republican for antirepublican constitutions.

There is just one other matter to which I will allude, and that is the provision in this resolution which repeals so much of the enabling act as requires the people of New Mexico to put into their constitution that no person may be eligible to hold a State office or to become a member of the legislature who can not speak the English language. This was a plain, direct, and, in my opinion, unwarranted attack on the Spanish-American citizens of New Mexico, whose patriotism and whose loyalty has never been found wanting in times of great public distress. They furnished more soldiers to the Union Army in proportion to their numbers than any State west of the Mississippi River. They have filled offices of trust and responsibility in the Territory ever since its organization, and they were guaranteed by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by the proclamation of Gen. Kearny, by the treaty of Gadsden, by the compact with Texas, and by the organic act of 1850 that they should enjoy forever all the rights of American citizens. Section 6 of that organic act expressly states:

The qualifications for voting and holding office shall be such as shall be prescribed by the legislative assembly—and since that day down to this no attempt has ever been made to deny them the rights which had been so sacredly guaranteed, and this requirement of the enabling act is just one more evidence of the tendency of the Republican Party to discriminate against these people.

This resolution removes this proscription, and I have no hesitancy in saying that there is no warrant anywhere in the Constitution for Congress to regulate, prescribe, or in any way interfere with the elective franchise in any State, so long as the right to vote is neither denied nor abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

In addition to this it is an utterly useless as well as a thoroughly impudent proceeding, because as soon as New Mexico is admitted as a State she can strike out of her constitution this provision which you forced her to put into it, and Congress will have no power whatever to interfere. This question is too well settled in the books to admit of any controversy. In Bolln v. Nebraska the Supreme Court of the United States declared:

This court has held in many cases that whatever be the limitations upon the power of a Territorial government they cease to have any operative force except as voluntarily adopted after such Territory has become a State of the Union. Upon the admission of a State it becomes entitled to and possesses all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States, and stands upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects; and again, not only did Congress declare that Nebraska was admitted upon an equal footing with the original States, but the whole Federal system is based upon the fundamental principle of the equality of the States under the Constitution.

The idea that one State is debarred, while the others are granted, the privilege of amending their organic laws to conform to the wishes of their inhabitants is so repugnant to the theory of their equality under the Constitution that it can not be entertained, even if Congress had power to make such discrimination.

And again, in Escanaba v. Chicago (107 U. S.) the court holds:

Although the act enabling the people of Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government and the resolution of Congress declaring the admission of the State into the Union refers to the principles of the ordinance according to which the constitution was to be formed, its provisions could not control the authority and powers of the State after her admission. Whatever the limitations upon her powers as a Government whilst in a Territorial condition, whether from the ordinance of 1787 or the legislation of Congress, it ceased to have any operative force, except as voluntarily adopted by her after she became a State of the Union. On her admission she at once became entitled to and possessed of all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States. She was admitted and could be admitted only on the same footing with them. The language of the resolution admitting her is "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever." Equality of constitutional right and power is the condition of all the States of the Union, old and new.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me express the hope that this resolution will be agreed to, and that the old doctrine which has been the cardinal principle of the Democratic Party from its foundation, the right of local self-government, may again be asserted as the guiding principle still, and that it shall not be written that our party, which has always been the party of the people, has refused to accept this, perhaps the last star that will ever go upon the flag, because the people of Arizona have in their constitution manifested an overconfidence in the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER]. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the first time in four years of service in this House that I have asked the attention of the House upon any question for any considerable length of time. I only do so now because I believe that every Missourian, whether to the manner born or by adoption, has a peculiar interest in the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States into this Union. It was the bravery and valor of Missourians that gave to this Union the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. It was the word and honor of Missourians that promised to the people of that Territory in 1846 a republican form of government. And I stand here to urge the American Congress to carry out the promises that have been given time and time again to the people of those Territories that they may come into this Union as States with equal representation and the rights of every other State. [Applause.] I appeal to my colleagues upon the other side of this Chamber from the State of Missouri to join with me and to join with this side of the Chamber in granting to these two Territories the rights that your people and my people in 1846 promised them they should have. [Applause.]

We not only promised it then, but in the treaty of 1848, the treaty, as it is called, of Guadalupe Hidalgo, we guaranteed not only that these Territories should become a part of the United States, but we guaranteed that they should become States of this Union as soon as the Congress of the United States should admit them, and we guaranteed that they should come here with the same standing, with the same rights as every other Territory that has been admitted to the Union of States. Ever since 1846 these Territories have been knocking at the door of this Congress for admission into the Union, and they have been denied.

During the remarks of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], the distinguished ex-Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON] wanted to know why the Democratic Party, when in control of the Government from 1893 to 1895, had not admitted these Territories into the Union. I want to ask my distinguished friend why it was that the Republican Party during all its long years of power did not admit these Territories as States into the Union? Does he think that the Democratic Party, in the brief period of two years, could remedy all the wrongs that the Republican Party in all its years of power has fastened upon the people of this country? Give us a little time and we will remedy, not only your sins of commission, but your sins of omission as well. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to go back a little while to the war between the United States and Mexico. You are all familiar with the history of that war. Where did we get New Mexico and Arizona and part of Colorado? They were one Territory at the time, under the Mexican Government. Who captured New Mexico and Arizona? Every man who was in the Army of the United States that gave New Mexico and Arizona and part of Colorado to this Union was a Missourian. All those men were Missouri soldiers, every single one of them. [Applause.] They were recruited from among the yeomanry of Missouri.

Mr. Chairman, you will pardon me if I take some time to go over this. In the year 1846 the first regiment of mounted volunteers was organized in Missouri. Its members were recruited from the people of Missouri. One thousand strong, they left the city of Independence, Mo., and rendezvoused at Fort Leavenworth, now in the State of Kansas. At that place they halted and were mustered into the service of the United States under Gen. Kearny. They elected their officers, and I think I can appeal to every Missourian when I say to you that the men who were elected officers of that regiment had all enlisted as privates. A. W. Doniphan was elected colonel, defeating a graduate of West Point. Maj. Gilpin, a graduate of West Point, was made a major of the regiment; and so on through the whole organization. Every man who held a commission in that regiment of 1,000 men had enlisted as a private soldier in the cause of his country.

They left Fort Leavenworth in June, 1846, under the lead of Gen. Kearny. He had an army—a great little army it was—of 1,685 men, as I now recollect the number. They started on their long march to Santa Fe, then in the complete control of the Mexicans. They started across the sand of the Great American Desert, as it was then called, which Daniel Webster said was not worth spending a single dollar of American money to put into the United States. Yet to-day this Great American Desert comprises the States of Colorado, Nebraska, and Kansas and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, that are knocking at the doors of this Congress and asking for admission into the Union of States.

This gallant army started on its march. Where? Across 900 miles of sand and desert for Santa Fe. They arrived there in less than 50 days, and the Mexican Army surrendered to them. What did the American officers do at that time? I have here the proclamation that Gen. Kearny issued to the people of New Mexico. He promised the New Mexican people that they should be admitted as States into this Union as soon as Congress could act upon their petitions. He promised that they should have all the rights and all the privileges of any other Territory that had ever been annexed to the United States. And ever since that time the Congress of the United States, whether it has been Democratic or Republican, has denied to these people the right to come into the Union of States.

Why ask the question now, Why did not this or that party do something when in control of the Government? This is too grave and important a matter to a half million American citizens for this great House of Representatives to haggle over for a moment more. Last Congress this House unanimously voted to admit New Mexico, but the bill failed in the Senate. Let us now, with equal unanimity pass this bill admitting both Territories and let the Senate assume the responsibility, if it cares to, of again defeating the bill.

Gentlemen, I want to say to you that I do not care whether the people of Arizona and New Mexico are Democrats or Republicans. I believe they are entitled to admission as States. I believe they are entitled to come into this Union upon the constitutions that their people have written, and it makes no difference to you or me whether we agree with them upon the things they have put into their constitutions so long as they comply with the conditions of the enabling act.

I was very sorry on yesterday to hear my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] inject any politics into this discussion. I am going to reply to him after awhile. I am standing here and urging you to admit these States into the Union, because I believe they are entitled to admission, and for the further reason that Missourians in 1846 promised the people of these Territories that they should be admitted into the Union as States, with all the rights possessed by other States of the Union. I want to see that promise kept.

In 1846 Santa Fe surrendered to Col. Doniphan and Gen. Kearny, who bore a commission from one of the greatest Democrats that ever lived in this country and one of the greatest patriots the country has ever seen, William L. Marcy, Secretary of War; and he promised the people of New Mexico that they should come into this Union as a State just as soon as Congress could provide the way for them to get in. At that time they had 160,000 people, but ever since that time the way has been barred. Why have they not been admitted? I am not here to say why; but the fact remains that they have not been admitted, and now they stand here as two separate States asking at the hands of the people's Representatives that they be admitted as States into the Union, and I appeal to the Republican side of this House to state any good reason why they should not be admitted. I intend to ask, before I conclude, permission to print in the RECORD the proclamation issued by Gen.

Kearny and the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, so that the people of this country may see just exactly how the American people, whether the Congress has been Democratic or Republican, have treated the people of these Territories ever since 1846.

What do I care for the recall? If the people of Arizona want the recall, they are entitled to it. That is my view upon this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the question of the initiative and referendum was submitted to the people of my State I voted against it; but a majority of the people of the grand old State of Missouri declared in favor of the initiative and referendum, and they are entitled to it. I believe in the rule of the majority every time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do our Republican friends say that because Arizona has incorporated into her constitution the proposition of the recall of judges that it makes that constitution unrepublican in form, contrary to the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States? No; not a single voice has declared that; but they say it is dangerous to admit a Territory with that kind of a law. How dangerous is it? Gentlemen, this is a country in which the people rule. This is the people's Government. Talk about the people reaching out and grasping for power! Let me say to you that the people in this Government do not have to reach out and grasp for power. They have the power already. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They have not surrendered one single bit of power to the National Government.

Oh, but the recall must not apply to judges. Who creates courts and elects judges? The people, of course. Since when, then, has the creature become stronger and greater than the creator. The power that makes can certainly be trusted to unmake, change, or alter their work.

Mr. KENDALL. One of the gentleman's colleagues the other day was expressing considerable apprehension if certain powers should be conferred upon the people. What does the gentleman have to say in that connection?

Mr. BOOHER. I am not here to answer for the apprehensions of any other gentleman. I am speaking my own views.

Mr. KENDALL. I understand the gentleman to hold that the power is resident in the people in the first instance.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; and always abides with them.

Mr. KENDALL. And that we have no power except what we acquire from them?

Mr. BOOHER. If the gentleman will tell me what he means, I can answer his question.

Mr. KENDALL. I mean this: If the gentleman will permit me to make a little statement.

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. I have heard considerable anxiety expressed here that the people might tear down this great fabric of government, might profane the temple of government, might do a great variety of other rather unseemly things if they had the power.

I gather from the gentleman's remarks that he is not afraid to trust the people to do anything they may think for their best interest.

Mr. BOOHER. Not at all.

Mr. KENDALL. I am a Republican, and neither am I afraid to trust them. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Good! the gentleman is a better patriot than a Republican. I want to say that I would rather trust the great body of the American people than any body of men that the great American people by their votes have clothed with power. [Applause.]

The American people may make mistakes; they may put men in high places that are not worthy, but if you will give them an opportunity to remedy the wrong they will do it the first time the opportunity is presented.

Why, I heard yesterday the argument of my friend from California [Mr. KAHN], and also my other friend from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and the whole theory of their argument was that it would be dangerous to admit the Territory of Arizona into the Union because of the provision for the recall of judges in the constitution of the new State. And yet it developed on a question asked by my friend from California [Mr. RAKER] that these two gentlemen themselves at the last election in California voted for candidates standing on a platform that pledged the Republican Party of California to pass the initiative, referendum, and recall, and that there was no qualification so far as judges were concerned. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If a good thing for California, why deny it to Arizona?

Gentlemen of the committee, I do not know why a judge is a sacred person. I know two Federal judges to-day that if I had the power to recall them I would vote to do it, and 90 per cent of the voters in Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska would join me. [Applause.]

Mr. WARBURTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. I will.

Mr. WARBURTON. Would the gentleman be in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin pending in this House for recalling United States Senators?

Mr. BOOHER. I want to say to the gentleman that with this hot weather and the dilatory performance in that body at the other end of the Capitol I am inclined to think that I would vote for it, but I am afraid the Senate would not pass it. [Laughter.] However, I want to say to my friend that I am not in favor of the recall proposition for any officer.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Before the gentleman commits Nebraska to the recall of the judges, I would like to ask him to state whether he refers to Federal judges or supreme judges.

Mr. BOOHER. I said Federal judges, and that only applies to two of them and not to the whole. The gentleman knows to whom I refer very well.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it a good objection to the admission of Arizona into the Union because they have the recall of judges? Let me say to you that more crimes have been perpetrated against the liberty and lives of the people of this world by judges of courts than were ever perpetrated by the people themselves? Who was the bloody Jeffreys? Was not he the judge of a court? Who condemned the Savior and sent Him to the cross? Was it not a judge?

Mr. SLOAN. They turned it back to the people.

Mr. BOOHER. They turned it back to the rabble that did not represent the people.

Mr. SLOAN. That was the first recall of which we have any history.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman ought to read sacred history before he says it was turned back to the people. It was a rabble and not the people of Galilee who believed in His teachings. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. The majority of the people of Galilee did not believe in His teachings.

Mr. BOOHER. The majority believed in Him, but the rabble who got Him in the Garden of Gethsemane did not believe in Him, and they were the fellows, they were the rabble, that had Him. If it had been left to the people of Galilee, Christ would never have been crucified. But suppose my friend is right, was it not a judge that turned the Savior over to the rabble? It was not the recall, it was the cowardice of a judge.

Who condemned Charlotte Corday to the guillotine? Was it the people? Oh, no; it was the judge of a court. Who sent Robert Emmet to the gallows? A court. Who sent the witches in Massachusetts to the stake? Was it the people? Oh, no; it was a judge every time. Who sent hundreds, aye thousands, to the guillotine during the French Revolution? Judges, of course.

Let me tell you that I believe the liberties of this country are safer in the hands of the people wherever they may be found and wherever they may be, safer in the hands of the people who believe in the Constitution and laws of this country, than they are in any organization, whether judicial or any other, that the people themselves have created. [Applause.] Do you believe it? I believe in a judiciary. My friends on this side of the Chamber are constantly addressing me as "Judge." I do not know why they do it. I never was a judge of anything on earth except a horse race, and I was said to be a very good one. [Laughter and applause.] I love and respect the courts. I have helped elect many a man to the supreme bench of the State of Missouri. There never has been one placed there, either with my vote or without it, that I would help to remove. While the majority of the supreme court of the State of Missouri to-day are Republicans I have the utmost confidence in their fairness, their ability, and their integrity. [Applause.] The people of my State would not vote to-day to recall a single one of those judges. We may not always agree with the decisions they render, but we have the utmost confidence in their ability, in their sincerity, and in their honesty of purpose.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. DYER] yesterday said that Missouri had been a Republican State for the last 12 years. Well, there has been a rocking of the old Democratic ship, and I am mighty sorry for it; but I want to say to my friend that when the first signs appeared in the heavens that Missouri was rocking the people began to desert her, and instead of increasing in population, in the strides she had taken before she commenced rocking, she has been decreasing in population, so that in the last 10 years the grand old State increased only 6 per cent.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, that is just race suicide down there.

Mr. BOOHER. No, no. We do not practice it out there. The small increase in the State has been principally in the county of St. Louis and in the city of St. Louis. All the great agricultural counties throughout the State have been losing in population. I do not say it is because she shows signs of leaving her political moorings, but if I were to apply the same reasoning as you apply I would say it was because she showed signs of becoming Republican, because you claim that the blessings of prosperity everywhere throughout this broad land of ours is because the Republican Party is in power.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman if the decrease in the population is not, in his opinion, because they have been sending so many missionaries out to other States and other countries, particularly New Mexico and Arizona, there to establish a civilization?

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, yes; the people are seeking homes where land is cheaper.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask my friend from Missouri if he does not remember the fact that the best part of the State of Missouri, the district that I represent, increased 45,000 in population in the last 10 years?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; so far as the increase of population is concerned, I think that is true, and that was because they expected my friend to come to Congress; they wanted him here. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I represent six counties that comprise the best agricultural country on the face of the earth. I am not overstating it when I say to you that that portion of the grand old State of Missouri, known as the "Platte purchase," has within her borders six counties, the wealthiest agricultural country on the face of this earth. You may build a wall around those six counties and to-day they could supply themselves with everything that is necessary for their comfort and convenience. It is an agricultural country that I wish every Republican in this Chamber could see. Why, you would not live in Maine or Michigan or anywhere else except northwestern Missouri if you could see that country just once.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I judge from the gentleman's description that it is very much like Michigan.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; very much like Michigan; but very much better.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman remarked that there is a drift to the city, and I think he represents the district which contains the city of St. Joseph. Has there been a very large drift from the country to St. Joseph during the last two or three decades?

Mr. BOOHER. I am glad my friend asked me that question. If my friend had been in Congress at the last session he would know how earnestly I strove to have a nonpolitical census of this country taken; how earnestly I asked that the census enumerators be appointed irrespective of party affiliations; and how I met the unanimous opposition of that side of the Chamber.

In the census of 1900 I am here to say the census rolls of the city of St. Joseph were outrageously padded. The taking of that census was done by Republican enumerators and supervised by a Republican supervisor, and they padded the census 25,000 names, and when the census was taken this time, instead of equaling the census of 1900 with a census of 103,000, there was, in round numbers, about 89,000. I do not know whether the census this time was an honest one or not, but I do know the one of 1900 was an outrageous, infamous proceeding, engineered and conducted by Republicans, and if the last census shows St. Joseph has lost population, let me say to my friend from Nebraska that, as a matter of fact, St. Joseph since 1900 has increased 20,000 in population, although the census shows she lost as I have stated.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. In view of the magnificent agricultural character of the gentleman's district, I want to know if they are very much alarmed over the prospect of Canadian reciprocity ruining them?

Mr. BOOHER. I have had a great many letters from the farmers and business men of my district. Now, I want to say, first, that in my district is the fourth largest cattle market in the world. The first is Chicago, then Kansas City, Omaha, and St. Joseph. Out of the numerous letters I have received in relation to Canadian reciprocity there are but two that express any doubt as to the benefit our people will receive from Canadian reciprocity. The people of Missouri do not believe that 7,500,000 Canadians can produce anything that can injuriously affect the production of 92,000,000 Americans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The distinguished ex-Speaker of this House remarked on yesterday that I had voted to admit New Mexico in the last Congress. I did. I am going to vote to admit New Mexico now, and if you gentlemen succeed in defeating the majority report I will vote for the minority report without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Now, what is the objection to the Arizona constitution? The recall of the judges. They say the President objects to it. I have not seen any official objection having been made. What do you know about what the President's objection is? I wish the President of the United States would show the same courage that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE] showed and the two gentlemen from California [Mr. KAHN and Mr. KNOWLAND], so that we might know from a public expression from him exactly what his objections are to the admission of Arizona as a State of the Union. Why, some gentlemen upon the other side have said that we can not trust the people; but do you forget this is a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people; and if that is true what difference does it make to you and me what the people of Arizona want so long as it comes within the definition of a republican form of government? What kind of a Government have we here? Let me read a few of the expressions of some of the men who formed this Government. But before I read that I want to say to you again I absolutely believe in the people of this country. I have worked with the people of this country; I have worked with them in the harvest fields; I have worked with them upon the highways; I have worked with them driving stock across the prairies before the railroads came into the part of the country where I lived, and I learned to love and respect the American people, and that love and respect has never left me. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe the American people can be trusted, and whenever they want a thing, however much I may disagree with them, I want to say to my good friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], I believe in letting them have it; and if it is wrong trust the people; they will remedy it and they will do right every time. But they say the judge may become unpopular and the people remove him. Some gentlemen say that President Cleveland would have been removed as President. There is no foundation for the statement. There never was a time when 25 per cent of the people of this country would have signed a petition to remove President Cleveland or to have removed President Lincoln or Washington or Roosevelt or anybody else. However much the people may disagree in their ideas of government the great body of the American people believe that every man has a right to his own opinions and has the right to express them.

I wish to God there were more men in office in this country to-day who had the nerve and courage of Grover Cleveland, so that the American people might know what their views were on great national questions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BOOHER. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has taken up the cause of the people very interestingly, and I agree with everything, I think, that he has said, so far as the people are concerned; but since we hear so much about the people in this Chamber and the people are constantly referred to as distinguished from somebody else, I am going to ask the gentleman if he will now define the term "people," in order that we may know, if he pleases to tell us, the difference between the people and that other portion of the community which does not seem to be embodied in the term?

Mr. BOOHER. Well, the word "people" is a very elastic one. The gentleman might apply to it any definition he pleases. I use it in its broadest sense. But I am very sorry to say that the American people have not been represented on that side of the Chamber for 16 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman pays a very high compliment to those people with whom he has been in converse for so many years, with whom he has traveled over the plains and on the farm, and I would ask the gentleman whether he distinguishes that class of people from the other great masses of people who live in urban centers, who work in the mills, who delve, and thrive, and prosper, and succeed, and help build up this country, just as does the man upon the farm and the man upon the plain? Is there any desire to distinguish as between these two classes?

Mr. BOOHER. There is no distinction between American citizens wherever you find them. The American citizen always loves his country; he always loves his flag; he is always in sympathy with the Government of his people and will follow the flag to death if need be. He has been wrongfully taught in the gentleman's part of the country. He has been taught to believe that the people are only those who represent some one great interest or industry in this country, and they send gentlemen to Congress with that idea.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would not care to throw out of his political economy that great body of people who take the products of the farm and make the farm profitable for the farmer by utilizing and consuming the products he has to sell?

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, may I ask the gentleman if he concedes there is some virtue in the man who does not live upon the farm, but who, in the city, takes the farmer's products, and when he refers to "the people," will he also include the man in the city who is doing his share toward the common welfare and prosperity?

Mr. BOOHER. I certainly include that great body of the American people in the word "people." It is a very broad term. I am willing to trust the people, whether they live in the city, laboring in manufacturing industries, or whether they labor on the farm or in the counting room or any other place.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then we all have a right to the term "people"?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly; we all have a right to it; and I embrace in that distinction all the people in this country, because I believe they are patriotic and we can trust them. Does the gentleman remember the days from 1861 to 1865?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I personally can not remember them.

A MEMBER. The gentleman was in the infantry then.

Mr. BOOHER. I have a brother lying in the cemetery at Hampton Roads. I remember the days of 1861 to 1865. I remember that in the section of the country where I lived the people sprung to the defense of the Union, every one of them. [Applause.] I remember another section of my country where, with an equal degree of patriotism, the people rose en masse and supported what they believed to be right. [Applause.] They fought it out, and they all belong to the great body of the American people now, and we need have no fear of them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no difference between those people to-day. We are all under one flag, if the gentleman will permit, and we are all working together, I hope, for the common welfare.

Mr. BOOHER. I hope so. Yes; we are all working together for the common welfare, and every man who is imbued with the proper American spirit is in favor of admitting Arizona and New Mexico into this Union at once, whether he occupies a seat in the White House or in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. You have stated that that side of the House did not represent the people, or were not the people now, as they had been transferred to the other side of the House. You said that the people had been transferred to that side of the House.

Mr. BOOHER. I said that the trusts and combinations had been represented on that side of the House for the last 16 years, and the people were now represented by this side.

Mr. SLOAN. Six hundred thousand more of the American electorate voted against that side of this House last year than voted for it.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman has his figures mixed, the same as the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. I say that 600,000 more among the American electorate voted against that side of this House than voted for it last fall.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not know where the gentleman gets his figures, but I do know that the majority is on this side of the House, and we propose to legislate whether our legislation suits you gentlemen or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. You have a plurality on that side of the House, but not a majority.

Mr. BOOHER. No; because you count along with yourselves the Socialists and the Prohibitionists. [Laughter and applause.] You may take all the rest who voted against the Democracy and then you have but a bare majority of the 92,000,000 of our people. Count all who voted against your party at the election and there would be a majority of more than a million against you.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said I was going to read something from the fathers who founded the Government, and then gentlemen can go out and say the people can not be trusted if they want to. Here is what John Witherspoon had to say about this Government of ours:

> Congress, popularly speaking, is the representative of the great body of the people of the United States.

We are the representatives, the agents, of the people of the United States. We are not their masters. There is not a man in this House that is the master of the situation in his own district. When he goes home and comes up for reelection two years from now, the people will judge whether he has been faithful or not. If he has not been faithful, the votes of the people will relegate him to the rear, and his place here will be filled by somebody who will meet the views of the people on these questions; that is the recall I favor. Let me read a little further. Here is what Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, says, and I want to call Mr. LEGARE'S attention to this:

> There is no reaching out for power.

This is from Charles Pinckney, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He did not think the people were reaching out for power. He said:

> Our Government should be made suitable to the wishes of the people, and we are perhaps the only people in the world who have sense enough to appoint delegates to establish a general government.

How establish a general government? The people elect delegates. The American people, Pinckney thought in 1796, were the only people on earth who had sense enough to elect delegates to establish a government, and now we, the representatives of that same people, undertake to say what a people shall put in their constitution—the Alexander Hamilton idea of the rights of the people.

Mr. SIMS. What State was Pinckney from?

Mr. BOOHER. From South Carolina. Now, I have heard a great deal said about Judge Marshall. It has been asserted that Judge Marshall would have been recalled, and gentlemen draw upon their imaginations for all sorts of arguments. This is the greatest place on earth—at least, the greatest place I ever was in—for people to draw upon their imaginations for illustration to support an argument. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague from Missouri?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman permit a statement? I am not in favor of life tenure of office for judges. I think much of the sentiment against the judiciary has grown up out of the arbitrary conduct of certain Federal judges more than any conduct of judges of the several States. Is it not true that the present sentiment in favor of the recall of judges grows out of this abuse of power, and that the people, in an effort to relieve themselves, have gone to the other extreme now? Does not the gentleman believe that it has been under the guidance of men who are undoubtedly patriotic that they have gone to this other extreme? For instance, take California, where I understand the State politics as well as the judiciary for the last quarter of a century have been dominated by the Southern Pacific Railroad. And in the last campaign in that State the issue was made on the influence the Southern Pacific Railroad had in politics of that State and controlling the judiciary, and the question of the initiative, referendum, and recall was placed before the people. The present Senator from that State, a progressive, was elected on that issue, and the present governor was elected on that issue, which was simply a protest against this abuse. But because that is true, does the gentleman think for the people of Arizona it is wise to adopt the recall as applying to the judiciary as a remedy? In other words, does the gentleman not think it ought to go to them from this Congress that while we recognize the right of the people to form their constitution and determine how the judges may be elected and how they may be impeached or recalled, yet it is the opinion of this Congress that they ought to place that limitation as an amendment to the constitution?

I expect to vote for the amended resolution, but I want it understood that I do so firmly believing that that provision in their constitution is unwise and that the people upon reconsideration will reject it.

Mr. BOOHER. It was the unanimous opinion of the Committee on the Territories that this proposition of recall of judges should be again submitted to the people of Arizona, that they might vote on it separate and apart from the rest of the constitution, trusting to the patriotism and the wisdom of the people of Arizona to decide it right and to decide it as they believe right; and, gentlemen of this committee, I want to say to you that I have all the confidence in the world in the descendants of the great Missourians who settled these Territories that they will decide it right. [Applause.]

There is no question about it. I believe you can rest in perfect confidence in submitting it to them. I want to say again, so that it will not be forgotten, that I would not vote for a recall proposition; but my individual ideas on this question ought not to control me in this great matter. The great question ought to be with me and with you, Republicans and Democrats, Does the constitution of Arizona in any way conflict with the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States? [Applause.] Is it in harmony with the enabling act? If it is, what right have we to say to the people of that Territory, "You must" and "You shall not"?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does not the Declaration of Independence recognize that the people can overturn the Government if it is not in harmony with their interests and does not safeguard their liberties?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes. I want to read something more. Something has been said by Judge Marshall. There is no man in American history to-day less understood than Judge Marshall. Whenever anybody wants to prove anything they refer to Judge Marshall, and it does not make any difference whether it is in their favor or against them they make the bold assertion that Judge Marshall said so-and-so when he never said it. [Laughter.]

Judge Marshall held that this was a government of the people. In the case of McCulloch against the State of Maryland, decided in 1819, Judge Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The Government of the Union, then, whatever may be its influence on the facts of this case, is emphatically and truly a government of the people.

"Emphatically and truly a government of the people." What right have we got to say what the constitution of Arizona shall be? Are we the people of Arizona? The woman that is the mother of my children was the daughter of a soldier that marched and fought all the way from Independence to Santa Fe. What were they fighting for? To give New Mexico and Arizona the same rights that you in California, in Illinois, in Tennessee, in Georgia, and in other States in this Union have. They were entitled to it, and they are entitled to it now. The people of a Territory ought to be permitted to decide for themselves what they want to write in their constitution. Now, here is another Supreme Court decision. In the case of Martin against Hunter's lessee, decided in 1816, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

The Constitution of the United States was ordained and established—not by the States in their sovereign capacity, but emphatically, as the preamble of the Constitution declares, by the people of the United States.

No court established it; no court ordained it; no organization that the people formed; but the people themselves, in their sovereign capacity, ordained and established this Government of ours, and they have just as much capacity to-day to say what shall be the form of government in New Mexico and Arizona as they had in 1786, and they are just as competent.

Now, here is something that James Madison said:

The sovereignty of the people of the United States was acknowledged by the Declaration of Independence, which declares that governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of certain inalienable rights it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new government, laying its foundations in such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and their happiness.

It is the people of the community always that are to form the fundamental law of a State to which these powers are intrusted. It is the people, and no matter upon which side of this aisle we may sit, you and I can afford to trust the great body of the American people at any time. As I said before they make mistakes, but if you give them the opportunity they right every mistake which they make sooner than any organization they ever created will right the mistake it makes.

Thomas Jefferson said:

By the authority of the sovereign power of the United States all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the Sates respectively or to the people.

Now, you can not have a State until the people of the Territory have adopted an organic law, and if they adopt a law that complies with the forms of the Constitution of the United States, let me appeal to the membership of this House again, what right have you and I to say that they shall not be admitted into this Union when their constitution complies with every requisite of the enabling act? I wish some gentleman would point out to me where it does not.

As a member of the Committee on the Territories I stand here to say to you that if any gentleman upon either side of this Chamber will point out to me a single instance in which the organic law of either one of these Territories does not comply with the Constitution of the United States and the enabling act I will ask to have this bill referred back to the committee, so that we may submit it to the people of the Territories. I want a fair deal in this matter, and I want the people of Arizona and New Mexico to be treated fairly.

My public career has been very short. Do you know that I have been attempting to break into Congress ever since the Fiftieth Congress? I did break into the Fiftieth Congress, and I think I hold the record of being the shortest-term Congressman that ever sat in this House. From the Fiftieth to the Sixtieth Congress I devoted all my time and energy to breaking into this House again; but I was told by my friends in my own party that the trouble with me was that I was too independent, that I always said what I thought, and that it was not always good politics to do so. I am going to say what I think to-day. It may not agree with some of my party, but I speak my thoughts, and I am going to stand by them before this House and before the American people. I have heard a good deal said about President Lincoln being the author of a certain sentiment, but nothing is further from the fact. Now, I am going to tell you who was the author of it. I want to call your attention to it, so that you may know just who was the author of that grand sentiment, and it is a grand sentiment. Now listen. You will find this in Volume III, page 321, of Daniel Webster's works, and I want my Republican friends to listen, because if there is any people on earth who need education along this line it is the Republican side of this Chamber. [Laughter.] Daniel Webster said in the Senate of the United States:

It is, sir, the people's Constitution, the people's Government; made for the people, made by the people, and answerable to the people. The people of the United States have declared that this Constitution shall be the supreme law.

Who? A court? Oh, no; the people of the United States have declared that it shall be the supreme law! Now, listen. We are not the masters of the people.

We are all the agents of the same supreme power—the people. The General Government and the State governments derive their authority from the same source.

We are the agents of the same supreme power—the people. Ah, the power of the people is supreme!

The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people have conferred upon it and no more, and all the rest belong to the State governments or to the people themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I commend those sentiments to the other side of this Chamber. I know it is like throwing pearls before swine [laughter], but perhaps they may think better of it. I want you to think over that proposition—this is a government of the people, by the people.

We have heard so much about the judiciary and that there is no fear that the judiciary shall ever usurp any of the rights or endanger the liberties of the people that I want you to pardon me while I read an extract from a message sent to the Sixty-first Congress by the President of the United States, and I want the reporters to print this in italics in the RECORD. It was in 1910. It was after this House and the Senate had refused to write into the interstate-commerce law the word "reasonable," which the Supreme Court lately did write into it. But, then, I must not criticize the Supreme Court. But I am permitted to say that I agree with Judge Harlan in his dissenting opinion in the Standard Oil case, am I not? [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not unparliamentary to do that. I am going to state it anyhow, that I absolutely dissent in toto from the opinion of the Supreme Court. I make no claim to being a great lawyer, but I have got just as much right to my opinion and just as much pride in my opinion as the Chief Justice of the United States; and when this Congress, the House and the Senate, composing the legislative branch of this Government, refuse to write into the interstate-commerce act the word "reasonable," I say it was a usurpation of power by the Supreme Court of the United States to write that word in there—a thing more dangerous than anything the American people have ever done [applause on the Democratic side], and I am going to prove it by President Taft himself.

Mr. FERRIS. But he is for it.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; he is now, but he was not when he sent that message to Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask whether the gentleman is in favor of a recall of the three Democratic members of that court who joined with the others in that decision?

Mr. BOOHER. No; but I trust to their good sense, their wisdom, their Americanism and patriotism to right the wrong just as soon as they get an opportunity to do it. Does the gentleman?

Mr. AUSTIN. But I think they decided right.

Mr. BOOHER. Then you are satisfied?

Mr. AUSTIN. I stand by the five Republicans and three Democrats.

Mr. BOOHER. Yet less than a year ago you on that side voted, under a leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], not to write it into the law, and yet you are ready to crawfish, and say because a court decided it should go there that it was right. I say if it was right, you ought to have voted for it and put it into the law, and you had not the courage of your convictions to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let me read to you what President Taft said about it. I do not know whether he is good authority on that side of the Chamber or not. [Laughter.] I am satisfied he is not with the insurgents, and as for the standpatters, God bless them, where are they anyhow? [Laughter.] Why, you may take a fish net 500 yards long and run it around that side of this Chamber and fish for standpatters, and I doubt whether you will catch more than the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and my old and esteemed friend—and I do not say it in any disrespect—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. You might snare them, but the rest of you would go through the meshes, every one of you. [Laughter.] Listen to President Taft in his message of January 7, 1910:

> Many people conducting great businesses have cherished a hope and a belief that in some way or other a line may be drawn between "good trusts" and "bad trusts," and that it is possible by amendment to the antitrust law to make a distinction under which good combinations may be permitted to organize, suppress competition, control prices, and do it all legally, if only they do not abuse the power by taking too great profit out of the business. They point with force to certain notorious trusts as having grown into power through criminal methods, by the use of illegal rebates and plain cheating, and by various acts utterly violative of business honesty or morality, and urge the establishment of some legal line of separation by which "criminal trusts" of this kind can be punished, and they, on the other hand, be permitted under the law to carry on their business. Now, the public, and especially the business public, ought to rid themselves of the idea that such a distinction is practicable or can be introduced into the statute. Certainly under the present antitrust law no such distinction exists. It has been proposed, however, that the word "reasonable" should be made a part of the statute, and then that it should be left to the court to say what is a reasonable restraint of trade, what is a reasonable suppression of competition, what is a reasonable monopoly. I venture to think that this is to put into the hands of the court a power impossible to exercise on any consistent principle which will insure the uniformity of decision essential to just judgment. It is to thrust upon the courts a burden that they have no precedents to enable them to carry, and to give them a power approaching the arbitrary, the abuse of which might involve our whole judicial system in disaster.

The court assumed the power that the President said was a dangerous one—"a power approaching the arbitrary, the abuse of which might involve our whole judicial system in disaster.

How can the position of the President be reconciled with the decision of the court? If Congress did right in refusing to write "reasonable" into the law, then the court must have erred when they assumed the power to write it into the law. I sincerely hope that some gentleman during this debate will point out where the power of the court to write the law ends and the right of Congress to write the law and have it declared as written begins.

Mr. AUSTIN. I object to the gentleman referring to the gentleman from Illinois as his "old friend."

Mr. BOOHER. While I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois politically, I am satisfied, so far as personal relations are concerned, that the gentleman from Illinois, the ex-Speaker, has nothing against me because I am a Democrat. I am the same kind of a Democrat as he is a Republican. I will stand up and fight for 364 days in the year, but if you win out in the election I will say that AUSTIN, of Tennessee, is a better man than I am, because the people chose him. And having made the choice, who shall say them nay?

Mr. AUSTIN. The objection I make is that the gentleman referred to Mr. CANNON as his "old" friend, when, in fact, he is one of the youngest——

Mr. BOOHER. Well, I will withdraw that and say my "esteemed" friend from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. And I have not gotten half through. May I have an hour more? [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield an hour to the gentleman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOOHER. The substance of what the President said was this: He congratulated the Congress of the United States that they had not written into the Sherman antitrust law the word "reasonable," because he said it was a dangerous power to give to any court and they might abuse it in the future. The very day after the decision was promulgated the stocks of the Standard Oil Co. went up, did they not? They were not hurt a bit; oh, no. They got, in the language of a certain newspaper, all they expected, and then some. That is true as you live. Now, speaking about Arizona, I will read you from the hearings to show the difference between the people of Arizona and New Mexico. I will do this for the benefit of my Republican friends. We had 210 pages of hearings before the Committee on Territories, and when I say they were strenuous I think my Republican friends will agree with that expression. Two hundred and nine and a half of those pages were devoted to New Mexico, and of all the bright men I ever saw, of all the bright men who were imbued with the idea of accomplishing a certain purpose, I never saw eight men more in earnest than those eight men from New Mexico. We had there the representatives of corporations; we had there men who were opposed to corporations; we had Democrats and we had Republicans; and I want to say to my friend from Pennsylvania we had the insurgents and——

Mr. DYER. What does the gentleman mean by insurgents; what does he understand them to be?

Mr. BOOHER. He is a man, a Republican, who believes in progressive principles as contradistinguished from my friend from St. Louis, who believes in the principle of standing still and that all of the good in the country comes from the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me tell you what the people of Arizona said when they came before that committee.

I am going to read it to you. Listen to it, so you can see how manly and American they were. They did not ask for anything that was not right, gentlemen; I want you to remember that. They only asked for an opportunity to get into this Union, and they were ready to submit to anything which might be asked, so you did not say "You must do it." They rebelled, as all Americans do, at the word "must." My fellow citizens, they were in the same condition as if a friend of mine came to me and requested me to do a certain thing and I would say, "I will take into consideration all your suggestions, and if I believe you are right, I will do as you request." And that is what the people of Arizona say to Congress.

Now, Mr. O'Neill, a very creditable and a very intelligent gentleman, made this statement:

> Mr. O'NEILL. We have prepared a constitution in Arizona that gives us a republican form of government. If you want to change any line of it, as long as you submit it to the will of the people of Arizona, we are willing, but we will not surrender a principle or yield for a moment the right to Congress or anybody to tell us what we have got to do in order to come into the Union of the States. That is our position.
> Mr. LEGARE. Would you be willing to have submitted simultaneously with the election of officers and admission into the Union the right of your people to vote once more on the recall of the judiciary?
> Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir. You can submit anything, because we believe in the people. That is what our constitution declares for. We are willing for you to pass on the constitution as it stands at present or to submit each and every item in that constitution separately to the people, to be voted on by them. We do not deny your right to make it a condition precedent to our admission.
> Mr. LEGARE. I agree with you.
> Mr. O'NEILL. That is the position of the Arizona people.
> Mr. HARDY. In other words, to submit at the next election any desired amendments?
> Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir; as long as the people are free to act on them as they see fit. It can be amended either by the act of the legislature or by the people of Arizona. They have the initiative and referendum. They can initiate an amendment if they see fit.

That is my position. Do you not agree with it, my friend from Tennessee? Do you not believe, so long as it is constitutional, that we have not any right to say to them what they must and must not do? I will trust to the patriotism of my old friend, Mark Smith, who formerly represented Arizona in this House, to advise the people on this matter. I will trust to the great body of the people of Arizona, whether they are Democrats or Republicans, to do what is right.

Does that side of the Chamber believe in the people? If you do not, who do you believe in? I believe in the American people and I believe in the people of Arizona.

I have read all of the hearings that were held on the Arizona constitution. Did you ever know a people that were more manly? Did you ever hear of a people knocking at the door of a great Congress for admission and to be given the right of every American citizen more manly in their position? They tell us that we can submit anything we please to them and they will consider it; that they will think about it. They said, "We want to know what you think about these things, and when you have informed us, we will consider it, and, if we are not giving away our rights or what we think is just, we will yield to you." I do not know any better method the people of Arizona could pursue to show their willingness to submit this matter again to the people for their decision.

Now, I want to go to New Mexico. New Mexico is a great proposition and a remarkable one. When I speak of New Mexico I am not going to tell any facts that I have learned outside of the committee room. I will make no statement that is not borne out absolutely by the witnesses who appeared before that committee. And I want to say now on the threshold that every one of them is an honorable man. One of the witnesses who appeared there was an ex-Delegate to Congress from that Territory, Mr. Fergusson, whom we all know. He was a Democrat. There were other Democrats there; there were Republicans there; the insurgents were there; but let me tell you, I believe them all to be honest, sincere men, and they all agreed upon the one proposition that New Mexico had been wronged in the enabling act. And I am going to point it out to you, and when I do I believe that my colleagues from Missouri on that side of the Chamber will vote with us to submit to the people of New Mexico an amendment making it easier for them to amend the constitution. No one objects to it if it did not delay the admission of the Territory as a State.

Now, something was said by my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] about corporations. Judge Fall, a gentleman I never met until he appeared before the committee—a man for whose ability and sincerity of purpose I have the highest regard, who is a Republican, time and time again stated that the constitution of New Mexico was not such a constitution as the people of New Mexico desired, but it was the best they could get, and that he had no objection on earth to the Committee on the Territories submitting an amendment to the people so long as it did not delay the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State, and with that sentiment every gentleman agreed. Why, gentlemen, my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] said that something was stated about New Mexico being under corporation control. Not only was it admitted before the committee that it was under corporation control, but this was the statement of one of the gentlemen to whom I have called your attention. He said:

It is not only corporation written, but it is corporation ridden.

Let me call your attention to just one word or two of these hearings on that subject:

Mr. FALL. There is some reason for mentioning corporation control of New Mexico, and there is absolute reason for my statement to Mr. Fergusson that the desire of those who were sincerely desirous of ridding New Mexico of such corporation influence—that their desire was to enact a corporation-commission law which would take the railroad corporations entirely out of the control of the legislature. As I said to him, that was our desire. It was sincerely so, because we do know, as a matter of fact, that New Mexico Legislatures have been controlled by corporation influence in the past, just exactly as some of the legislatures of some of the other States have been.

Mr. HARDY. Are you not fixing this so that future legislatures can not amend your corporation provision without an amendment to the constitution?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir. The future legislatures can not change this except to provide additional machinery and additional power necessary to carry out the powers vested in this commission and the people of the Territory.

The fifth paragraph of section 2 of the enabling act I want to call your attention to. I think it is worth while. I do not want to misstate facts. I have been taught by experience in courts that it is best to stick to the facts, because if you do not the judge will. The committee tried to get the facts in relation to the conditions existing in New Mexico from the gentlemen who appeared before it. Here is a question asked of Judge Fall, the leading Republican in that Territory, and no doubt one of the gentlemen who will represent that new State in the Senate of the United States if it should elect Republican Senators. The chairman asked him this question in reference to paragraph 5 of section 2:

The CHAIRMAN. What do you think of the provision in the enabling act which prohibits anyone from being a member of the legislature or holding any office if he does not speak the English language?

Mr. FALL. I think it was an outrage upon the people who had come in here upon the absolute assurance that they should never be deprived of that right. When they took the oath of allegiance that right was absolutely guaranteed to them under the hand of the President of the United States.

Mr. BOOHER. Do you know where this provision originated?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; but I do not know whether I ought to divulge any parliamentary secrets. Senator Beveridge originated this provision.

STATEMENT BY MR. M'GILL.

There are very many things that ought to be considered in the creation of a new State. They can not all be adjusted at once. We do not ask it. There are some things that should be changed. Pardon me if I go back a little. I want to say here that if it is within the power of this Congress, and I believe it is, and in their wisdom to change the provision in the enabling act by which a man is prevented from holding office or being a member of the legislature unless he can speak the English language, I think in the interest of humanity and fair dealing, in the interest of right and justice, that that proposition should be changed, so that any man who is otherwise a qualified elector may be qualified to fill any office to which his people may elect him.

You take a man from a foreign country who does not speak a word of English and when he comes to the State of New York, or any other State of this Union, the question of his language is not a qualification to hold office. Why should it be with us? The people you are dealing with are not foreigners, but people who were born and raised there, good people, and many of those people's fathers and grandfathers were born and reared right on the ground on which they live to-day. There are good citizens who can not speak the English language sufficiently well to hold office under the terms of this constitution. Why should that stigma be placed upon men who are not foreigners, but American citizens, and who are as loyal to the flag of the United States as any people that walk this earth? Why say to them: "You can vote, you can serve on a jury, you can pay your taxes, and when the flag is in danger you can take your musket (which they will do and go to its defense as quickly as any men on earth), yet because you speak the language of your father and your grandfather, you can not go to the legislature, neither can you hold any State office." It is not fair. It is not right. I have no interest in those people except as a citizen of that country. I know them, and I will say to you that under the circumstances and surroundings that those people have been raised in, you will find nowhere a better or a nobler or more loyal people than the people commonly called Mexicans in New Mexico.

Mr. BOOHER. That prohibition applies only to State officers and members of the legislature?

Mr. MCGILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOOHER. Do you believe it would be binding on the legislature after once elected; would not they be the judges of the qualifications of their own members?

Mr. BOOHER. I am asking for your opinion, if you care to express it.

Mr. MCGILL. I have not looked into that proposition, but it has been held by some lawyers that the legislature would be the judge of the qualifications of its own representatives.

Mr. BOOHER. Are these Spanish-speaking people who would be affected by this prohibition objecting to that disqualification in the constitution?

Mr. MCGILL. Yes, sir; very strongly.

Let me add that when Santa Fe surrendered to Gen. Kearny, as I said before, he issued a proclamation in which he said that he was authorized to receive the people of New Mexico into the Union as a Territory, and that they would be soon admitted into the union of States with all the rights of the other States of the Union. We said it again in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. We promised them that same thing, and we promised it to them time and time again. No matter who is responsible for the delay—I do not care who—we ought to keep our treaty agreements and our promises to these people. My fellow Missourians, we ought to endeavor to stand together and help remove from the people of that Territory the unjust discriminations which have been made against them.

I say the provision in the enabling act which undertook to define the rights of the American citizens to hold office in New Mexico was unconstitutional, and that the people are not bound by it. Only because, as Mr. Fall said in his testimony, it was put in the constitution because the enabling act compelled them to put it in.

Now, what do you think about that—telling those people who shall and who shall not be qualified to hold an office in that State? Let me read to you another thing that Judge Fall said, and I am going to ask, after a while, permission to publish in the RECORD four or five pages of the testimony of Judge Fall, giving the history of that Territory. I wish I had done that before this discussion began, because if I had I do not believe there is a man within the sound of my voice in this Chamber, if he would take the time to study this question, if he would read those pages, who would not be prompted to help remove from those people the odium that we attached to them by putting that clause in the enabling act and making it a condition precedent to their admission. You not only got those Territories by the valor and bravery of Missouri troops, but we gave Texas $10,000,000 for a quitclaim to that portion of New Mexico and Colorado that was in controversy at the time. In the Gadsden treaty again we promised that we would admit these Territories into the Union on an equal footing with all the other States of this Union. You will find on page 51 of the hearing the particulars about that. We ought to keep our word, and I hope this Congress will do it.

Now let us go to page 55. Here is an interesting statement. I know my friends on that side of the Chamber love Tammany Hall. But Tammany Hall in its palmiest days could not hold a tallow candle to the condition existing in New Mexico, according to Republican authority.

They have got the worst condition of affairs down there that ever was inflicted upon the people anywhere upon the face of the earth. And notwithstanding this constitution imposes all these burdens and hardships upon them, they say, "Give it to us, rather than what we have got." Now listen to what a Republican says. During the hearing before the Committee on the Territories, when Judge Fall was being heard, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONNELL] asked this question:

Mr. CONNELL. In the search you made of the constitutions of the various States, did you find any case in which it was provided that no person should hold office in that State unless he spoke a certain language?

Mr. FALL. None.

Mr. CONNELL. Then New Mexico will stand alone among the States of the Union with that provision.

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; absolutely. It was what we regarded as an insult to the intelligence of our people. They do sometimes elect a man to the legislature who needs an interpreter, but the Spanish people are very diffident, and even when they understand the English language, some speak it brokenly. We laugh at them, but they do not laugh at us if we make mistakes in attempting to speak Spanish. The consequence is that unless a man feels that he has a thorough acquaintance with the English language, he will not speak it at all.

Mr. CONNELL. Are the people content with that provision? Are they satisfied for it to remain that way?

Mr. FALL. No, sir; they are absolutely dissatisfied with it. They take it because they had to under this protest I read to you, which was placed in the constitution itself.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman refer me——

Mr. BOOHER. You will find that on page 55 of the hearings.

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman to refer me to the provision of the constitution.

Mr. BOOHER. In a moment I will do so. But let me read further:

Mr. BOOHER. You mean that they are willing to accept anything in order to get State government.
Mr. FALL. The fact is the Territory has been governed from Washington.
Mr. BOOHER. Has it not been a good government?

Now, listen, you people who are afraid of Tammany Hall. Listen to what your own brother said about it:

If you happened to have a constituent who was bothering you in your district and you could not place him elsewhere, you would send him out to New Mexico.

That is going a long way, is it not? I do not know whether my smiling friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will agree to that or not, but that was the testimony before that committee.

If you happened to have a constituent that you wanted to get rid of, he was given an appointment and sent to New Mexico to prey upon the people. This does not apply to Democrats.

Mr. FALL. There have been more politics to the square inch in New Mexico in the past few years than Tammany Hall has ever known.

And that is exactly the condition down there. Gentlemen, if in your wisdom you decide that you want to disfranchise the Spanish-speaking people of New Mexico, whose ancestors were there 300 years before the American soldiers set foot on that soil; if you conclude you want to disfranchise them and refuse to strike that provision out of this enabling act, you have the power to do it, and the people of New Mexico, in order to get a State government, will accept your decision.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The resolution of the majority, as I understand, proposes to amend the enabling act in this respect.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is not proposed to amend the constitution of New Mexico.

Mr. BOOHER. We can not amend that. We can submit it to them.

Mr. MANN. You are proposing to submit to them another proposition. You are not offering to submit that to them.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; that is embodied in the majority report of the committee, to enable them to more easily amend their constitution. You see, they followed up the enabling act and put that same disqualification in their constitution, because, as Judge Fall said, they believed they were bound by the enabling act.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Missouri think there is any provision of that sort in the enabling act that will have any weight so as to prevent the people of New Mexico from amending their constitution after they are admitted if they choose to?

Mr. BOOHER. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. What effect, then, will it have to amend the enabling act after they are admitted under their constitution?

Mr. BOOHER. Here is the proposition exactly: The people of New Mexico believe that that was a condition precedent to their admission, and they placed the same disqualification in the constitution. The provision for the amendment of the constitution is such that the people of the Territory do not believe they can amend it in the next 99 years. The president of the constitutional convention, when their labors were ended and they were about to adjourn, arose in his place and made this remark:

We have given them a constitution that they can not change in 99 years.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what that has to do with this question. The gentleman proposes now to amend the enabling act by a provision which will have no validity after the State is admitted under its constitution, and proposes to admit the State with the provision that is so objectionable in the constitution.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman from Illinois does not go far enough. Our proposition is to submit to the people of New Mexico a proposition making it possible for them to amend their constitution, which they do not now believe they can do, and we propose to amend the enabling act by striking out the disqualifying provision.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Missouri have any doubt that the provision in the enabling act dies when the State is admitted into the Union?

Mr. BOOHER. No; but gentlemen who appeared before the committee did not entertain the same views. It would have been all right if the constitutional convention had not written into the constitution the same prohibition. The people of New Mexico do not think they can amend the constitution unless we amend the enabling act.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the people of New Mexico will read the speech that I am going to make here they will not have any doubt about it.

Mr. BOOHER. I know that the speeches of the gentleman from Illinois are always illuminating. All the gentlemen who appeared before the committee agreed to submit this amendment if it would not delay the admission of the Territory as a State. And I may say, without violating any rules of the House, that the committee unanimously agreed to it.

I now read from the One hundred and seventy-eighth United States Reports, page 570:

It is obviously essential to the independence of the States, and to their peace and tranquillity, that their power to prescribe the qualifications of their own officers, the tenure of their offices, the manner of their election, and the grounds on which, the tribunals before which, and the mode in which such elections may be contested should be exclusive and free from external interference, except so far as plainly provided by the Constitution of the United States. (Taylor & Marshal v. Beckham, 178 U. S., 570.)

Each State has the power to prescribe the qualifications of its officers and the manner in which they shall be chosen. (Missouri v. Audriano, 138 U. S., 496.)

The court decided that in no event could the Congress of the United States fix and determine the qualifications of an officer in any State in this Union. Yet that is what we did under the enabling act. I do not believe that anybody in this House knew anything about it; I believe it slipped through, as many things do in the hurry and rush of the closing business of Congress, without a careful investigation by the Committee on Territories. I do not believe for a moment, if that provision of the enabling act had been called to the attention of the committee, it would have received the support of a single member. We have it in our power to remedy it, and why not do it?

Let me again read the fifth paragraph of the enabling act:

Fifth. That the said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers and members of the State legislature.

Yet from the time New Mexico has been a Territory there have been in the legislature of that Territory men who could not read or speak the English language, and I believe the evidence shows that there were three men in the convention that framed this constitution who could not speak the English language. At the same time the evidence is that they were among the ablest and best men in that convention. Yet here we undertake to say that these men should not have the right to hold an office in that State! Are you in favor of that, my Republican friends? Do you not think we ought to submit to the people of that Territory the question of whether or not they want to continue that disqualification? Do you not believe we ought to make it so that these people could get rid of that?

I see my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] in the Chamber now, and I note on yesterday that he said something about the control of the legislature, and I want to refer to it while he is here. I believe he wanted to be exactly right in his statement of facts in the matter; but when I say to you that there is no gerrymander in any State in this Union that can compare in iniquity and outrage with the gerrymander of the State of New Mexico, I think I am wholly within the truth. Do you know that seven counties in that great State, if it becomes a State, will absolutely control the destinies of the State, and every one of the seven is absolutely controlled by the corporations?

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. ANDREWS. The gentleman states that those counties are absolutely controlled by the corporations.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS. I say that the gentleman is very much mistaken.

Mr. BOOHER. I know the gentleman would not stand by my statement, but I am speaking, as I said at the outset, not from what I learned outside, but I am speaking absolutely from what was divulged by the witnesses before the Committee on Territories, and if it was not true, my good friend from New Mexico ought to have risen in his place and denied it.

Mr. ANDREWS. When my time comes I will give that subject good attention so that the gentleman will understand it.

Mr. BOOHER. I hope so. I certainly do not want to make a misstatement, but I am speaking of the testimony before the committee. I do not know what my friend has under his belt, I am not able to tell that, but I do know what was divulged in the committee room, and I am simply speaking of that. Now, let us get down to it and see whether these counties are corporation controlled. I do not know about the facts and I want to acquit myself now of being a witness. I am controlled by what I learned before the committee, and if the witnesses did not tell the truth, I must charge it up to the Republicans, because I am relying entirely on the testimony of Republicans. If you will turn to page 74 of the hearings you will find this from Judge Fall:

There is some reason for mentioning corporation control of New Mexico, and there is absolute reason for my statement to Mr. Fergusson that the desire of those who were sincerely desirous of ridding New Mexico of such corporation influence—that their desire was to enact a corporation commission law which would take the railroad corporations entirely out of the control of the legislature.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has forgotten that testimony. They did it, they spiked their guns, and they not only spiked them, but they drove it in so that you could not drill it out in a lifetime. Did you ever try to drill out an old cannon that was spiked with a rat-tail file? If you have, you know how it is, how hard it is. You can compare that with this constitution. They can not drill it out; they absolutely take the control of the railroad corporations away from the New Mexico Legislature, and that is one of the reasons why these people come here and ask you to submit a proposition that they might amend their constitution more easily. Then he goes on further and says:

As I said to him, that was our desire. It was sincerely so, because we do know, as a matter of fact, that New Mexico Legislatures have been controlled by corporation influence in the past, just exactly as some of the legislatures of some of the other States have been.

Mr. HARDY. Is that Judge Fall that you are reading from?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is that why you want to put it in the control of the legislature?

Mr. BOOHER. No. Does the gentleman want me to tell why?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Because I would rather trust it to a legislature of 100 men than to a railroad commission of 3. Would the gentleman? I believe in the rights of the people. I believe in the right of the people to control their own affairs in their own way. The members of the legislature are elected for two years. If they sell the people out they have to settle in two years. If the railroad commission sells them out they are secure for six years. I am in favor of the people every time. He goes on further on the next page——

Mr. OLMSTED. Who selects the railroad commissioners?

Mr. BOOHER. The people, and, I am sorry to say, a majority of them are Republicans. If you read these hearings, my friends, you will find that these witnesses, without a word of difference, stated that the Territory was absolutely under the control of corporations, and that it would take a political revolution to give them relief without an easier method for amending the present constitution.

The president of the convention was the attorney of the Santa Fe Railroad and the attorney of every railroad in the Territory of New Mexico. Now you know why they got a corporation-written constitution. Are not you with me willing to let these people have an opportunity to amend, so they can get from under these corporations in that country? I think you would if you would read these hearings and consider them properly. Now, this same man, Judge Fall, said—but before I read that I want to say that my friend, the former chairman of the Committee on the Territories, brought into the Sixtieth Congress a report, signed unanimously by Democrats and Republicans, asking for the repeal of a certain law passed by the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico that was so outrageous that the committee, over the signature of my friend HAMILTON, reported that it was an infamous law. He said it was an infamous law, and you and I and every other patriot in this House voted to repeal it, and it was repealed unanimously under the power we had under the act creating the Territory. Here is what Mr. Fall said about that:

The Congress of the United States, under the organic act, under the power reserved to the Congress to disapprove of any act of the New Mexico Legislature, disapproved of that act, and it was denounced as the most vicious piece of legislation that was ever seen or read by any Congressman, I believe, in the United States Congress. I voted for that law.

Why, it was so infamous that the Republican chairman of the Committee on the Territories brought into this House a report that it was a vicious and infamous law, and it was unanimously stricken from the laws of the Territory. Read the testimony of Judge McGill, one of the ablest men of that Territory. I will not take the time to read it, but I want you to read it, and I think you gentlemen will agree with me that those people ought to have some relief from the power of these corporations under which they have been for the last 15 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I want to call attention to another clause of the constitution of the Territory of New Mexico. I am going to take the time to read section 7, and I call the prayerful attention of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to this. I know how he stood here in the last Congress, working as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for a fair and just railroad law for the people of the United States. I know he has not forgotten it. I know he is willing that the people of New Mexico shall be fairly treated by the corporations as he was that the people of the United States should be fairly treated, because he and I voted the same way——

Mr. MANN. On what?

Mr. BOOHER. That the word "reasonable" should not be written into the law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was not in Congress until many years after that law was passed.

Mr. BOOHER. No; we had it up in the last Congress——

Mr. MANN. Neither the gentleman nor I were in Congress until many years after that law was passed.

Mr. BOOHER. Do you remember the message President Taft sent to Congress when we refused to write the word "reasonable" in? That is the last session, and you were here. Now, the trouble with my friend is he has the most wonderful information of any man in this House, but it is not always reliable. That is the trouble; he forgets, like the balance of us. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. It is reliable on this occasion.

Mr. BOOHER. No; it is not. I beg my friend's pardon.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about a law passed in 1890.

Mr. BOOHER. I am talking about an amendment to that law that was reported last Congress from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is usually correct, but in this instance he is mistaken. No such amendment was ever presented to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; no such amendment was ever reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and no such amendment was ever presented or reported from any committee of this House since 1890, when the Sherman law was passed.

Mr. BOOHER. Then I will ask the gentleman what President Taft meant in his message when he congratulated us because we did not write the word "reasonable" in the law of 1910? And then I would like to ask my friend another question, Does he approve of the decision of the Supreme Court that writes the word in?

Mr. MANN. I have read the decision. Have you?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes, sir; thoroughly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman read the decision through?

Mr. BOOHER. Thoroughly.

Mr. MANN. So have I. I approve of it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Has the gentleman read Judge Harlan's dissenting opinion?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; I have. I have read the extracts that were in the paper, and that is all you gentlemen have read.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. I have read the opinion through. That is more than the gentleman has done, and I suspected it.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not believe the people indorse the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not believe the court has the right to write into the law the word "reasonable" when the Congress of the United States refused to put it there. I know that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which writes the word "reasonable" into the law simply destroys its effect and puts in the power of the courts to say what is and what is not a reasonable or unreasonable restraint of trade; it is simply saying, in effect, that there are good trusts and combinations and bad trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, and the power to decide that question is with the court. I do not want any court, however great it may be, to write into the laws of this Government a proposition that Congress refuses to write in the law.

Mr. HARDY. Judge Harlan says they refused it two or three times.

Mr. BOOHER. There is no question about it. There were decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered five or six years ago in which they refused to consider the word "reasonable" in connection with a matter of interstate commerce; and when the Standard Oil Co., that somebody describes as an octopus—whatever that is—that sainted corporation, comes in, they write the word "reasonable" in the law.

I do not know whether it is right or not. I have my opinion, and I have just as much pride in it as anybody else has in their opinion.

Now, let us get down to this corporation. I am going to read this right straight through, and I want my friend from Illinois to listen to it, because he fought and helped us, and under his leadership I voted with him every time, because I believed he was right. I voted for the physical valuation of railroads.

He did. We were all for it. We passed it, but the Senate took it out. I want my friend to listen to this:

SEC. 7. The commission shall have power and be charged with the duty of fixing, determining, supervising, regulating, and controlling all charges and rates of railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping-car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers within the State; to require railway companies to provide and maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents and facilities for the accommodation of passengers, and for receiving and delivering freight and express; and to provide and maintain necessary crossings, culverts, and sidings upon and alongside of their roadbeds, whenever in the judgment of the commission the public interests demand, and as may be reasonable and just. The commission shall also have power and be charged with the duty to make and enforce reasonable and just rules requiring the supplying of cars and equipment for the use of shippers and passengers, and to require all intrastate railways, transportation companies or common carriers, to provide such reasonable safety appliances in connection with all equipment as may be necessary and proper for the safety of its employees and the public, and as are now or may be required by the Federal laws, rules, and regulations governing interstate commerce. The commission shall have power to change or alter such rates, to change, alter, or amend its orders, rules, regulations, or determinations, and to enforce the same in the manner prescribed herein: Provided, That in the matter of fixing rates of telephone and telegraph companies, due consideration shall be given to the earnings, investment, and expenditure as a whole within the State. The commission shall have power to subpœna witnesses and enforce their attendance before the commission, through any district court or the supreme court of the State, and through such court to punish for contempt; and it shall have power, upon a hearing, to determine and decide any question given to it herein, and in case of failure or refusal of any person, company, or corporation to comply with any order within the time limit therein, unless an order of removal shall have been taken from such order by the company or corporation to the supreme court of this State, it shall immediately become the duty of the commission to remove such order, with the evidence adduced upon the hearing, with the documents in the case, to the supreme court of this State. Any company, corporation, or common carrier which does not comply with the order of the commission within the time limited therefor may file with the commission a petition to remove such cause to the supreme court, and in the event of such removal by the company, corporation, or common carrier, or other party to such hearing, the supreme court may, upon application, in its discretion or of its own motion, require or authorize additional evidence to be taken in such cause; but in the event of removal by the commission, upon failure of the company, corporation, or common carrier, no additional evidence shall be allowed. The supreme court, for the consideration of such causes arising hereunder, shall be in session at all times, and shall give precedence to such causes. Any party to such hearing before the commission shall have the same right to remove the order entered therein to the supreme court of the State, as given under the provisions hereof to the company or corporation against which such order is directed.

Now I want to call your special attention to this:

The commission shall have power to change or alter such rates, to change, alter, or amend its orders, rules, regulations, or determinations, and to enforce the same in the manner prescribed herein: Provided, That in the matter of fixing rates of telephone and telegraph companies due consideration shall be given to the earnings, investment, and expenditure as a whole within the State.

Do you know why they exempted railroad corporations? Why did they not make the same rule apply to the railroad corporations? The answer is clear. The convention was dominated by the railroads, and they simply cut the throats of the people. They were willing that these commissioners, when they came to decide what was a reasonable rate between the telegraph and telephone companies and the people, should take into consideration all those facts enumerated, but when they came to the determination of matters relating to the railroad corporations the commissioners were not vested with power to determine anything. I would like the gentleman from Illinois to explain it in his speech.

Mr. MANN. I could explain it if I should take the gentleman's time. It is easy.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I simply want to call the attention of the gentleman to section 1 of that article—article 11—which says:

The commission shall have power and be charged with the duty of fixing, determining, supervising, regulating, and controlling all charges and rates of railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers within the State.

And so forth.

Mr. BOOHER. Can my friend tell me why, when they provide as to what they should do with regard to telegraph and telephone companies, they should leave the railroads out? There is no physical valuation of railroads provided for there at all. There is no power to enforce it.

I stand here and say as a lawyer that there is no power in that section of the constitution of New Mexico to enforce its provisions. There is absolutely no power. The people are handicapped and bound hand and foot; thrown under the wheels of the railroad corporations of the future State of New Mexico. And we are simply asking, my fellow Members of Congress, that you confer upon the people of that Territory the right to amend the constitution. The people have some rights in that matter, and I hope this House will take them into consideration and give the people relief.

Now, I am going to consider another phase of the question, which I had hoped would not be brought into the discussion.

My friend from Ohio, my young and good-looking friend, the member of the Committee on Territories—and I have the utmost respect for him—when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] yesterday asked him something about the population of the senatorial districts in that State, if I remember aright, said there was not a single district in that State where the population was three times the ratio of representation. Now, the gentleman evidently answered that question on the spur of the moment, without giving it a moment's consideration. I say to you that there are districts in the new State of New Mexico where the population is more than three times the ratio for representatives in the State senate, and, strange as it may be, whenever one of these districts appears it is overwhelmingly Republican.

Now, let us see. Here is the first district, for instance——

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am largely in sympathy with the sentiment he has expressed in his talk. Before he leaves this corporate-commission proposition, I understand the gentleman's committee has reported in favor of the admission of the State under this constitution.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I wondered if the gentleman in his argument had treated that provision fairly. Does he not realize that the only way the legislature can regulate these matters is by a commission?

Mr. BOOHER. I am glad my friend has asked me that question. If I had time I would refer to the hearings, but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asked Judge Fall if the constitution was not so written that it would be impossible for the people of that Territory to change the law in regard to railroads and the railroad commission, and he said yes, absolutely. I am continually referring to Mr. Fall, because he is a Republican, and I think gave the committee correct information.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am not questioning that. I defer to the gentleman on that point; but conceding all the gentleman has said on that point, is not the gentleman's criticism of this commission clause in the constitution rather unfair? In other words, can the Legislature of New Mexico or any other legislature regulate the railroads and these corporation affairs in any other way than through a commission?

Mr. BOOHER. No; but let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in this connection they have undertaken to do it in the constitution, in the organic law, and have deprived the legislature of any right to interfere with it without an amendment to the constitution.

Mr. KENNEDY. Just forget about that for a moment. Is it not also true that in this provision giving this commisssion, which is elected by the people, the right to regulate these rates or to frame these regulations, and giving the opportunity of automatic appeal to the supreme court of the State, you have in that way adopted the most progressive way and the best way, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, to compel absolute compliance with the orders of that commission and the will of the people?

Mr. BOOHER. I have heard that idea advanced. I have listened to it and heard the argument, but if the gentleman will read this article carefully he will see that there is no provision in the article on corporations authorizing any order, whether made by the railroad commission or the supreme court, to be carried into effect, and an appeal from the order of the supreme court must necessarily act as a supersedeas. You have a provision in the law saying it goes into effect, but it does not state the order shall take effect if an appeal is taken, as the law of nearly every other State does.

Mr. KENNEDY. The gentleman is aware that the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prentiss against Atlantic Seacoast Line, which went up, I believe, from the State of Virginia, decided that the action of the Supreme Court was still legislation and that the Federal court could not enjoin those acts until after the Supreme Court had passed finally upon those questions.

Mr. BOOHER. When they have passed finally upon it, as they would, if my friend has read that article thoroughly, he will see that when there is no appeal taken the commission must send the record to the Supreme Court; and when they send it there a decision is made by the Supreme Court upon the record; but if an appeal is taken from the decision of the commission, then the court has the right to hear evidence anew; and let me say to the gentleman that that commission can not subpœna a witness to appear before it to testify. They can not force a witness to appear before them to testify unless they have an order of a court—not an order from the judge of a court to bring a witness before them, but the subpœna must issue on the order of a court.

Mr. KENNEDY. The State of Oklahoma has substantially the same provision.

Mr. BOOHER. I am very sorry if they have.

Mr. KENNEDY. And the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of which I speak—the Prentiss case—has strongly intimated that it is the quickest, the most progressive, and the best way for the people to deal with these corporation rates.

Mr. BOOHER. Well, I am not familiar with the case the gentleman cites, but I am willing to concede that he states the facts as they are, but that does not alter my opinion about it. When you sit down and read this provision thoroughly and study it, you can not help coming to the conclusion yourself, exactly as these people stated before the committee, the constitution was corporation ridden and corporation written.

Now, my friend from Ohio said, in answer to a question by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS], that there was no district in the State of New Mexico that had more than three times the ratio fixed by the convention for a State senator. As I said before, the gentleman was surprised by the question. He did not know that it was loaded. So I concluded that I would find out about it, and I spent a good part of a hot night working it out, and I find there are districts in New Mexico that, if my good friend and colleague [Mr. BARTHOLDT] were here, would make him have a fit. He would forget that there was ever a gerrymander in Missouri. It is the most outrageous thing that I ever heard of in my life, and I would not say a word about it if my friend from Ohio had not brought it before the House. There are 7 counties in New Mexico with a population of 77,000 that elect 12 members to the State senate. The ratio for State senator in New Mexico is 13,500. The first district is San Miguel, with a population of 22,930. The second district is San Miguel and Mora, with a population of 35,541. Why did you put San Miguel onto Mora? Because Mora is a doubtful county, and if you put San Miguel on, with 1,600 Republican majority, you have got them where you want them.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is what they intended to do.

Mr. BOOHER. San Miguel is an overwhelmingly Republican county, but that is not all San Miguel gets. They were so afraid that some county would get away from them that they put San Miguel with Guadalupe, and they have a population of 33,857, an overwhelming Republican majority, so that in three districts there is not any more chance of a Democrat or an opposition to the regular corporation-ridden candidate than there is for a snowball in Hades. [Laughter.] The fourth district, Rio Arriba, has a population of 16,624, overwhelmingly Republican, and the sixth district has a population of 25,203—that is, Rio Arriba and Sandoval—strongly Republican.

Now, I am not finding any fault with this. They have exercised their right, but I do not want any Member on that side of the House to pay any attention to Dr. BARTHOLDT when he talks about gerrymandering. This beats them all and gives them nine points in the game.

Now, the fourth district, Rio Arriba County, has a population of 16,624; the fifth district, Bernalillo, San Juan, and Sandoval, a population of 40,689; the sixth district, Rio Arriba and Sandoval, population 25,203; the seventh district, Bernalillo, 23,609. Where is the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. ANDREWS. Bernalillo has over 23,000 population.

Mr. BOOHER. But I am showing you how many times Bernalillo counts; it counts three times, making three Republican districts.

Mr. ANDREWS. I wish it was four.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not blame the gentleman for calling it a dandy, for that is the name to apply to it.

The eighth district, Colfax, has a population of 16,460. That is Republican, of course. Colfax has only 3,000 more than the ratio. Let us see what they do with Colfax. They want to make sure that nothing was going to get away, and so they make Colfax and Union a district of 24,939 population. Colfax can elect two senators. You know sometimes Colfax kicks out and might be dangerous, but you prevent it and put it where it can not manifest any signs of danger at all.

Mr. AUSTIN. We wanted to make the election of our genial friend here absolutely certain in the United States Senate.

Mr. BOOHER. If that is what you were after, I am sure you did it. Now, let us go on. Let us take the tenth, Santa Fe, 14,470, Republican. Then there is Taos County, population 12,008, Republican, one senator. Next, Valencia, the twelfth district, 13,320, Republican. You have not found a Democrat yet.

Mr. ANDREWS. It is a Republican county.

Mr. BOOHER. Democratic senators are as scarce as hen's teeth. You can not find them easily, and yet my good friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] said we had 11 senators. Oh, how strange it is, how very very strange that the truth will bear so much stretching. I do not want to say anything else.

Mr. ANDREWS. How many Democrats have you got?

Mr. BOOHER. Six, according to your statement. I am taking it from the testimony. You have 17. That is according to the statement you made before the committee. I am judging from your own testimony, and I think it was right. Let us go on. There are some magnificent things that appear here. Let us go on to the thirteenth, with a population of 37,023. Now, listen. It is made up of the counties of Sierra, Grant, Luna, and Socorro. Oh, they fixed that, so that there was not any question. Shades of Barthold! Thirty-seven thousand having a representative with four counties to make it, in order to make it absolutely sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The control of the time is with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri does not occupy the time of the House very often, and I think it is nothing but right that we should give him unlimited time for this debate, and I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to yield him more time.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there is no use of the gentleman appealing to me. I was going to yield the time, but if he asks unanimous consent and it is granted, then the time does not come out of my time, and I would prefer that.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that can be done under the rules. The agreement was that the time should be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That was a unanimous-consent order of the House, and the Chair does not think that a unanimous-consent order of the committee can change the unanimous-consent order of the House.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield the time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BOOHER. I thank the gentleman from Virginia and also the gentleman from Tennessee. Socorro forms a part of a district with Sierra, Grant, and Luna.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is the thirteenth.

Mr. BOOHER. Socorro is the fourteenth. Now, Socorro County, with a population of 14,761, forms a district by itself, overwhelmingly Republican. They were not through with poor old Socorro County yet, so they took Socorro and made it a part of the fifteenth district, with a population of 39,771, three times the ratio for a district, and that district is made up of the counties of Torrance, Otero, Lincoln, and Socorro. Socorro therefore absolutely elects three representatives in the State senate, with but 3,000 population more than the ratio necessary to elect one.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is mistaken about Socorro. It has only about 14,000 people, and has only about 1,200 more than the population necessary to elect one senator, though it elects three.

Mr. BOOHER. I am obliged to the chairman for the correction. It has only 1,200 more. But let us go on down. We have not struck any Democratic districts yet. I am not complaining. They have a right to do it, and if you could see the map of the districting of New Mexico for State senators I am satisfied that you would at once admit that it was the greatest work of art ever presened to the American people. It should be called to the attention of the Fine Arts Commission. Then we take the county of McKinley, with 12,963, and they gave that one senator. McKinley is a Republican county. It has less than the ratio, but they give it a Senator. Then they go on down. We have not struck a Democratic district yet, and we have 17 of them called over.

Now we get to the eighteenth, Otero and Lincoln. Both of these have been in districts before; they put them together, to make a Republican district. Have not we done mighty well? Now we are getting to a lot of Democratic districts, and here is where "the author of my policies" gets in. The good people down in that Territory named a county Roosevelt, and it is overwhelmingly Democratic—one senator; population, 12,064. Chaves County, population 16,850, 3,000 more than the ratio, is 1,200 Democratic.

Mr. ANDREWS. It is not 1,200.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman stated before the committee it was. It is in the testimony, and I am going to publish the counties and majorities as given to the committee and admitted to be right by my friend from New Mexico [Mr. ANDREWS]. Why pursue it further; there are 17 Republican senators, 6 Democrats, and 1 doubtful. A gerrymander is an outrage anywhere, I do not care where it occurs. I say that the people of this country have a right to have a fair and honest apportionment of the people of this country. A fair, honest apportionment of the people of this country would have made this House Democratic for the last 10 years. Take the maps printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They talk about a Democratic gerrymander. Some men here ought to be mighty thankful that it is arranged as it is, because they could not get into this House if there was anything near like a close majority in the district they represent.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] stated that he took his figures for the majorities he gave from the last congressional election. He will permit me to call his attention to the statement before the committee that the majorities could not be based on that vote, for the reason that the election turned principally on the personnel of the candidates rather than on political questions. It was conceded by all familiar with the Territory that there was a Republican majority of 5,000 in the Territory. The convention that framed the constitution was composed of 71 Republicans and 29 Democrats—a very comfortable working majority.

Another evidence of fairness of the convention in districting the State can be seen in the arrangement of the judicial districts. Two out of the eight districts are given to the Democrats, one with a population of 18,000 and the other with a population of 58,000; and in the latter district the judge in going to some of the counties must cross the mountains, go through a part of Texas, and travel 200 miles.

Oh, Republicanism, how many wrongs and outrages have been perpetrated in thy name!

Statement of Mr. Jones, of New Mexico:

Mr. JONES. I know of one district where that was not apparently taken into consideration, the district composed of Taos, Colfax, Union, and Quay Counties. Taos is west of the mountains and has no railroad connection whatever with the rest of the district, and to get to Taos by the usual route you have to travel by way of Santa Fe, a distance of about 200 miles. In order to get from Raton over into Union County you have had to go until very recently through the southern part of Colorado to Clayton, the county seat of Union County. In order to get to the county seat of Quay County, in that district, from Clayton, you have to go into the State of Texas.

I have occupied a great deal more time than I anticipated, but I want to say to you, in all earnestness and sincerity, I feel deeply upon this subject. I feel as though the honor of the State of Missouri is at stake in this question. I feel as though every Missourian, no matter upon which side of this Chamber he sits, is bound, as he loves his State, to vote for the majority report of this committee. Do you know that when Doniphan and his regiment started from Leavenworth on their march across the plains of Kansas, Nebraska, and New Mexico, they bore a flag given to them by the good women of Missouri, and the motto emblazoned upon that flag was, "The love of country is the love of God."

It was under that flag that these Missourians captured Arizona and New Mexico, and it was under that flag that these Missourians promised the people of Arizona and New Mexico that they should be admitted into this Union as soon as possible with all the rights and privileges of the people of any other State in the Union. Now, as Missourians we are bound to carry out the compact, signed and sealed by Missourians, to give those people that kind of a State government. Are you ready to keep the promises given by such men as Willard P. Hall? Are you willing to keep the promises made by Gilpin? Are you ready to keep the promises made by Sterling Price? Are you willing to keep the promises made by Francis P. Blair? If you are, you have but one thing to do and that is to vote for the adoption of the majority report of the Committee on Territories.

Why, a Missourian, Francis P. Blair, was appointed the first United States attorney for the Territory of New Mexico. He and Willard P. Hall and A. W. Doniphan wrote the first code of laws for that Territory, and many of the laws are in existence there to-day. Willard P. Hall had a unique experience in that war. He enlisted as a private in the First Missouri Volunteers. Before he enlisted, A. W. Doniphan, who afterwards was colonel of the regiment, and himself were candidates for the Democratic nomination for Congress in the primaries. Hall, a stripling of a boy 25 years of age, defeated Doniphan for the nomination. He enlisted as a private, went to Santa Fe, went down to Matamoros, 3,500 miles across sandy deserts and alkali plains, came home and represented his district in Congress, having been elected by 3,000 majority out of a vote of 10,000 while he was away in the Army. He afterwards was war governor of the State of Missouri.

Francis P. Blair, a Missourian, the first United States attorney for the Territory of New Mexico—you all know his history. What Missourian is not proud of it? A major general in the Union Army, then a United States Senator from the State of Missouri. Every Missourian loved him, every Missourian reveres his memory. He wore the blue. There was Sterling Price, whom all Missourians loved and honored.

No soldier of the North or South in the time of battle, whatever the fortunes of war might have been, ever had reason to find fault with his treatment when he fell into the hands of Gen. Sterling Price. He wore the uniform of a major general in the Confederate Army. Gen. James Craig, who represented his district in Congress, the district I have now the honor to represent, was a lieutenant in that army of Missourians. He came home. He wore the blue. He was a brigadier general in the Civil War. And I might go through this entire list and call the roll. I could tell you of Maj. Gilpin, who enlisted as a private, who was afterwards elected major of that regiment, and who was the only man, it is said, in Jackson County, Mo., who voted for Abraham Lincoln in 1860. He became the first Territorial governor of the new Territory of Colorado. I might call your attention to Napoleon B. Giddings, who was a private through that long, weary march of 3,500 miles. He was the first Representative in this House of the Territory of Nebraska.

And so they were all heroes; they were all great men. They appeal to us to-day to fulfill their promises and keep their word that they made to the people of New Mexico when they promised them admission into this Union with all the rights of the other States. They did not attach to their promise the qualification that a man must read and speak the English language in order to hold an office in a home that had been his 300 years before our soldiers put their feet on the soil of that country. And it is an outrage for the American Congress to say to-day that because my parents educated me in the language of my forefathers I can not hold an office in the community where I have lived all my life and where all the testimony shows me to be an upright, honest, and intelligent citizen.

I tell you, I am opposed to disfranchisement. I do not care where it comes from. I lived under it once, and I know all about it. I know all about its outrages. I know how men feel when they are stripped of the right to hold an office when a majority of the people ask them to hold it, and that is what we have done in this enabling act for New Mexico. Are you willing to stand for it? Are you? Then stand for it, but I appeal again to my colleagues from Missouri to stand with me back of that illustrious group of heroes that marched with Doniphan. You can not read the roster of that regiment without reading the names of heroes who made this Nation great, not only in that war but in the great war between the States. They were upon both sides. In the State I hail from we had many men upon both sides. Missouri furnished 110,000 men to the Union Army and furnished 100,000 men to the Confederate Army. To-day those men live in perfect accord and harmony. They join hands on every Memorial Day. In my town they march side by side under the same flag, keeping step to the beat of the same drum, to the graves in the cemetery, and they decorate the graves of the soldier of the North and of the South alike. [Applause.]

I make this appeal to Missourians. Let us keep the faith that our fathers pledged. Let us keep the word they gave, and when we realize and reflect that the flag that floated over the first mounted regiment of Missouri volunteers in the Mexican War bore the inscription, "Love of country is love of God," let us march under that banner and give those people what they are entitled to; let us give them free admission to this Union, unhampered by any such conditions as are sought to be imposed upon them by the enabling act. [Prolonged applause.]

ADDRESS OF GEN. KEARNY TO THE PEOPLE OF NEW MEXICO AUGUST 19, 1846.

New Mexicans, we have come amongst you to take possession of New Mexico, which we do in the name of the Government of the people of the United States. We have come with peaceable intentions and kind feelings toward you all. We come as friends, to better your condition and make you a part of the Republic of the United States. We mean not to murder you or rob you of your property. Your families shall be free from molestation, your women secure from violence. My soldiers will take nothing from you but what they pay for. In taking possession of New Mexico we do not mean to take away your religion from you. Religion and government have no connection in our country. There all religions are equal; one has no preference over another; the Catholic and Protestant are esteemed alike.

Every man has a right to serve God according to his heart. When a man dies he must render to his God an account of his acts here on earth, whether they be good or bad. In our Government all men are equal. We esteem the most peaceable man the best man. I advise you to attend to your domestic pursuits, cultivate industry, be peaceable and obedient to the laws. Do not resort to violent means to correct abuses. I do hereby proclaim that, being in possession of Santa Fe, I am therefore virtually in possession of all New Mexico. Armijo is no longer your governor. His power is departed. But he will return and be as one of you. When he shall return you are not to molest him. You are no longer Mexican subjects; you are now become American citizens, subject only to the laws of the United States. A change of government has taken place in New Mexico, and you no longer owe allegiance to the Mexican Government. I do hereby proclaim my intention to establish in this department a civil government on a republican basis, similar to those of our own States. It is my intention, also, to continue in office those by whom you have been governed, except the governor and such other persons as I shall appoint to office by virtue of the authority vested in me. I am your governor; henceforward look to me for protection.

PROCLAMATION TO THE INHABITANTS OF NEW MEXICO BY BRIG. GEN. S. W. KEARNY, COMMANDING THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE SAME, AUGUST 26, 1846.

As by the act of the Republic of Mexico a state of war exists between that Government and the United States, and as the undersigned at the head of his troops on the 18th instant took possession of Santa Fe, the capital of the Department of New Mexico, he now announces his intention to hold the department, with its original boundaries (on both sides of the Del Norte), as a part of the United States and under the name of the Territory of New Mexico.

The undersigned has come to New Mexico with a strong military force, and an equally strong one is following close in his rear. He has more troops than necessary to put down any opposition that can possibly be brought against him, and therefore it would be folly and madness for any dissatisfied or discontented persons to think of resisting him.

The undersigned has instructions from his Government to respect the religious institutions of New Mexico, to protect the property of the church, to cause the worship of those belonging to it to be undisturbed and their religious rights in the amplest manner preserved to them; also to protect the person and property of all quiet and peaceable inhabitants within its boundaries against their enemies, the Eutaws, Navajos, and others. And while he assures all that it will be his pleasure as well as his duty to comply with those instructions, he calls upon them to exert themselves in preserving order, in promoting concord, and in maintaining the authority and efficiency of the laws, and to require of those who have left their homes and taken up arms against the troops of the United States to return forthwith to them, or else they will be considered as enemies and traitors, subjecting their persons to punishment and their property to seizure and confiscation for the benefit of the public treasury. It is the wish and intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free government, with the least possible delay, similar to those in the United States, and the people of New Mexico will then be called on to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the Territorial legislature; but until this can be done the laws hitherto in existence will be continued until changed or modified by competent authority, and those persons holding office will continue in the same for the present, provided they will consider themselves good citizens and willing to take the oath of allegiance to the United States.

TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO, CONCLUDED FEBRUARY 2, 1848—ARTICLE 9.

The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted, at the proper time (to be judged of by Congress of the United States), to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution, and, in the meantime, shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property and secured in the free exercise of their religion, without restriction. (S. Doc. 37, p. 519.)

PROTOCOL, MAY 26, 1848.

The American Government, by suppressing the ninth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and substituting the third article of the treaty of Louisiana, did not intend to diminish in any way what was agreed upon by the aforesaid article 9 in favor of the inhabitants of the territories ceded by Mexico. Its understanding is that all of that agreement is contained in the third article of treaty of Louisiana. In consequence, all the privileges and guaranties, civil, political, and religious, which would have been possessed by the inhabitants of the ceded territories if the ninth article of the treaty had been retained will be enjoyed by them, without any difference, under the article which has been substituted. (S. Doc. 37, p. 526.)

LOUISIANA TREATY, APRIL 30, 1803—ARTICLE 3.

The inhabitants in the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. (S. Doc. 37, p. 258.)

STATEMENT OF JUDGE A. B. FALL, OF THREE RIVERS, N. MEX.

Mr. FALL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to read all of this matter, nor am I going to ask to have it printed.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me from the questions that have been asked by some members of this committee that it would probably be best now to call the attention of the committee to some of the conditions that have caused the framing of this constitution in the way it has been framed. I presume that we all know that there never has been a constitution adopted in any State of the Union, nor by the Union itself, that has not been subjected to criticism and opposition. I think that all of us remember the very strenuous opposition that developed to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A great many of its provisions did not suit a great many of the people. I think I recall that Mr. Patrick Henry fought Mr. Madison in the Virginia constitutional ratification convention over the provisions of the Federal Constitution. But I can readily understand that members of this committee do not realize the conditions existing in our Territory, because these conditions are different from those existing in any of the other States in the Union. These are conditions peculiar to the Territory, and they brought about the framing of certain of the articles and sections in this constitution. There is prevalent throughout the country an entirely mistaken idea about New Mexico and the New Mexicans, particularly about those whom we designate as native citizens. There is even a mistaken idea about the name of the Territory. I presume it possible that if you gentlemen thought about it at all you would conclude that New Mexico was named for old Mexico, but the fact is that New Mexico was named 100 years before old Mexico was named.

Old Mexico was the Province of "New Spain" 100 years after New Mexico was known as New Mexico. New Mexico was governed directly by the King of Spain, and its governors were appointed by the viceroy. The southern boundary of the Province of New Mexico extended to nearly 400 miles south of Juarez, opposite El Paso, Tex., it included the States of Colorado and California, and extended on the north to the Frozen Sea, as shown on the map of the Duke of Burgundy. New Mexico was "discovered" by Coronado in 1541, and was settled by Oñate in 1595. In marching toward New Mexico he discovered the settlement of Santa Barbara, near what is the present mining camp of Parral. He found the country inhabited by Indians who belonged to the same tribe as the Aztecs in Mexico City. They were dressed in cotton cloth. He wrote back that he had discovered a "New Mexico" (referring to Mexico City), and he was appointed or authorized by the viceroy to proceed to explore New Mexico. For 100 years New Mexico was cut off from old Mexico by 400 miles of desert. New Mexico took no part in the Mexican revolution, because, as I have explained, these people were cut off from old Mexico. They formed a community of their own, and in some respects theirs was the most remarkable communal form of government this country has ever known. The settlements were made along the Rio Grande River from the Colorado line to the Texas border. Grants were made by the Spanish Government to the communities, and royal commissioners were sent up there to divide the land into severalties amongst the colonists. The irrigation ditches which were constructed were constructed in common and have been owned in common for over 300 years. They have an entirely different water system from that which you have in Colorado and other States of the Union; that is, in so far as the Rio Grande section is concerned.

Mr. MARTIN. My town is located along one of those grants.

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir. Recently we have adopted the Colorado and other systems of irrigation where they can be enforced in the Territory; that is, in the new settlements of the Pecos Valley, the San Juan country, and other localities. The condition of these people was very different from anything that ever obtained in old Mexico. These settlers in New Mexico, instead of being peons and slaves subject to some great family, were independent colonists and independent landowners. They constituted an entirely different class of settlers from those in old Mexico. That has been their condition for 300 years and is the same to-day. When they came into the United States they brought with them not only their laws as to waters and their communal form of government, but they brought the law of acquest property and many other civil laws, forms, and customs. Under the law of acquest community property the wife is the partner of the husband and is entitled to one-half of the entire estate. Now, that does not suit some of our people. Some who have come into the Territory more recently do not understand the old irrigation system, and the consequence is that whenever they see something come up about it in the constitution and the legislature they do not understand it. While that is an old custom here, they do not want anything of the kind. Well, as a matter of fact, it is the only system which would work out properly in the communities where these people live and where they constitute over one-half of the population. With the American settlers, who have acquired property from and live among them, they constitute over one-half of the entire population of the Territory. Now, these people were never connected, except as indicated, with old Mexico.

When Gen. Pike went into New Mexico in 1806, and the Santa Fe trail was afterwards opened, the people of New Mexico—and I can give you the names of some of the families—sent their children to school, not in old Mexico, but they sent their children to Missouri to be educated. They sent their children into the United States to be educated. The Lunas, the Chavezes, the Armijos, Oteros, Pereas, Romeros, and others were very prominent families in New Mexico, and sent their children to school in St. Louis. Their girls were educated at Notre Dame and in other places in the United States. After the establishment of the Santa Fe trail, New Mexico was in the line of the great freighting operations between Independence, Mo., and old Mexico. There were 300 miles of desert between New Mexico and settlements in old Mexico, and 100 miles in the southern part of New Mexico, known as the Jornado del Muerto (Journey of Death), and these people in New Mexico were the go-betweens between the citizens of the United States and settlements of New Mexico and the people of the northern States of old Mexico.

As I have indicated, these people were familiar with American institutions, and the children of those who were able to bear the expense were educated, as I have stated, in the United States. They knew by far more of American institutions of government then than they know to-day or have ever known of the institutions of old Mexico. Following the opening of the Santa Fe trail and the system of freighting of which I have spoken came the Mexican War, and Gen. Kearny, with Doniphan and his volunteers, crossed the country on his way from Independence, Mo., or Fort Leavenworth, into Mexico.

The people of New Mexico welcomed the Americans. They welcomed Gen. Kearny when he came into Santa Fe, because he came with a letter from the Secretary of War in one hand and his commission from the President of the United States in the other, saying to the people of New Mexico that they had come there to absolve them from their allegiance to old Mexico and to welcome them as citizens of the United States, and that they should establish a State government such as the other States in the Union had. After that the Territorial government was formed, such as we have had now for 60 years. Gen. Kearny issued his proclamation to the people of New Mexico inviting them to come in and take the oath of allegiance to the United States. He said, "We are not going to hurt you; we are going to protect you; we will welcome you as American citizens, with all the rights of American citizens; come into the United States, take the oath of allegiance." The proclamation went on to say that "just as soon as possible we are going to establish for you a legislature, and you will pass your own laws, enact your own legislation, and be a self-governing State. As soon as it is possible to do so, we are going to establish for you a State government under this authority from the Secretary of War." The secretary of the Territory, or Province, of New Mexico took the oath of allegiance to the United States and was appointed lieutenant governor of the Territory by Gen. Kearny under his authority from the Secretary of War. I want to explain this to you in order to show that these people are not in any sense Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you think of the provision in the enabling act which prohibits anyone from being a member of the legislature or holding any office if he does not speak the English language?

Mr. FALL. I think it was an outrage upon the people who had come in here upon the absolute assurance that they should never be deprived of that right. When they took the oath of allegiance that right was absolutely guaranteed to them under the hand of the President of the United States.

Mr. BOOHER. Do you know where this provision originated?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; but I do not know whether I ought to divulge any parliamentary secrets. Senator Beveridge originated this provision.

When the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was made with Mexico, the only modification made as to the promise of Gen. Kearny of immediate statehood was that New Mexico should be admitted to statehood so soon as Congress might decree. That was 60 years ago.

Mr. HARDY. Did that apply to New Mexico and Arizona also?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; at that time Arizona was a part of New Mexico. It was that portion of New Mexico which was inhabited very largely by the Apache Indians, and was known in the old Mexican records as the "Apacharia," or Apache County. Arizona was first settled by the Jesuits, and New Mexico was settled by and entirely under the control of the Franciscan friars. The first settlement in Arizona was at a silver mine in the "Apacharia," or Apache country.

Mr. HARDY. Was that prior to the settlement around Santa Fe?

Mr. FALL. Arizona was settled in 1737, and the Franciscan government in the Territory of New Mexico was established in 1595, and Santa Fe was settled in 1620 or just prior to that time.

While the Congressman has called my attention to it, I want to say that I heard a remark made by one of my friends from Arizona the other day to the effect that so far as he was concerned he did not like the Mexican vote and would have them disfranchised. He did not mean by the Mexican vote such as we have in New Mexico. He has reference to the old Mexican peons working in the mines. There were very few Mexican settlers in Arizona except those who have come in in the last few years, following the development of the mining industries in Arizona. There are two old Mexican families in Arizona—the Sanmlegos and the Aguirres—and there are no better or more honorable families of the corresponding class living anywhere in this country.

When the Gadsden purchase was made and the flag was raised under the treaty of Gadsden, the same provision was made guaranteeing the right of Mexicans as citizens of the United States, and again when the organic act establishing the government of New Mexico was enacted by the United States Congress; it was also in the compact with the State of Texas. Texas claimed all that portion of New Mexico lying east of the Rio Grande River and up into Colorado. They established a government at Santa Fe; they created it in New Mexico in two or three different counties, but when they undertook to take possession, the acting governor of New Mexico, Donaliano Vigil, refused to recognize the authority of the State of Texas and called on the President for protection. Col. Monroe was sent out there, and the President sent a message to Congress calling attention to the very grave difficulties that might arise and saying that some arrangement must be made with Texas. In pursuance of that message of the President of the United States, Texas was paid $10,000,000 for a quitclaim to that portion of New Mexico and Colorado which was involved. In that compact with Texas again the rights of the people who occupied that strip were guaranteed, and at the same time the organic act, which has been our fundamental law down to this time, contained the same provision. It was provided by the Congress of the United States that every one of these Mexicans had the right to vote and hold office.

I have referred to these matters for this purpose: You will see if you undertake to take away from them the right to vote, it will create great dissatisfaction, and the right of suffrage must be absolutely guaranteed to them in the constitution or they will prefer to remain where they have been for 60 years, under the Congress. They would prefer to remain under the power of Congress than to have these rights taken away from them by any constitutional provision. Therefore, it was necessary for us to assure them that they would be protected in these rights, in which you have protected them in the treaties I have referred to before we could persuade them that it would be better to come into the Union. My friend, Gov. Curry, has referred to the fact that they sent troops to the Civil War and to the Spanish-American War. The records show that New Mexico furnished more volunteers for the Union cause in the Civil War than was furnished by any other State or Territory west of the Mississippi River in proportion to its population. At the same time, the southern part of New Mexico, and where they sympathized with the southern cause, furnished a large proportion to the southern army. In the Spanish-American War the records of the War Department show that New Mexico furnished more than her quota of soldiers called for by the President of the United States. They have been patriotic American citizens; they are American citizens in the best sense of that term. They appreciate our Government, and not one of them would go down into old Mexico if he were offered in exchange for his American citizenship one of the princely cattle ranches of that Republic. I can speak and understand the Spanish language, and have mixed with the people for a great many years, and no more loyal or devoted people ever lived.

I want to say to you that there are no more trustworthy people anywhere, and no people ever had more respect for the constituted authorities of civil life than does the native population of New Mexico. In an election, if a native Mexican gives you his word that he will vote for you, he will certainly vote for you. I will admit that I am very fond of the Mexican people. Now, then, we know these conditions. There were 32 of these people—representatives of the best families in New Mexico, as intelligent, broad-minded, and patriotic American citizens as can be found in any State of the Union—in that constitutional convention. Thirty-two of them were in the constitutional convention.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] is recognized for an hour.

[Mr. PICKETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. BOOHER was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has some one on his side to yield to at this time, and after that it is agreed that some time will be consumed on this side.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in the temporary absence of the chairman of the committee, Mr. FLOOD, from the Hall, I take the liberty of yielding one-half hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONNELL].

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make no excuse for asking to be heard in this House because I am a new Member. It is because I believe that there is a principle involved in the question of the new Member of Congress that I insist upon being heard. If there be truth in the observation that "God must have loved the common people, because He made so many of them," it may follow by the same logic that the American people have a tender leaning toward new Members of Congress, seeing that they occasionally make so many of them in one batch, as they so recently did. [Laughter and applause.]

Again, as wisdom sometimes falls from the lips of babes, it may happen that the new Member, in his childlike and picturesque innocence of congressional experience, may say something which ought to be said, but which, when he thinks he has grown wise and politically cunning, as I have heard even Congressmen have been known to do, he might never say. [Laughter.] The new Member comes straight from the people, blown in on the breath of the cyclone, right from where the thing started, and, no matter how he looks or how he talks, he deserves a hearing, and that before he waxes too wise to venture in where fledglings merrily and all unsuspectingly plunge. [Applause.]

No greater question than the one already up in this discussion has figured in statehood debates in this House, namely, the status of the people in our Government.

In attacking the recall in this debate gentlemen have lifted the matter to a higher sphere than has been reached before in the discussion of statehood in our time. I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that, so far as the recall is concerned, I voice the present thought of the vast majority of those who sent me here when I oppose it as applied to members of the judiciary or to any other public servant in New York State; but when opposition to the recall involves a denial of the intelligence and patriotism of the American people sufficient to warrant confidence in them to exercise that power to the safety and honor of the courts, I protest against the doctrine plainly defined in that argument. Recall or no recall, the courts are safe in the care of the people as are the destinies of the Republic. If this be not true, then who shall mark the limit beyond which the people shall not go in government, and who shall curtail their power?

The gentlemen picture the judge against whom the recall has been invoked by 25 per cent of the voters as consigned to oblivion and disgrace. Pray, what would the 75 per cent of the people to whom the judge would resubmit himself be doing in the meantime?

Suppose, sir, that by any conception of conditions it were possible to-day for the Standard Oil Company to apply the law of recall to the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Surely it would not be the rabble that would be behind such a recall; but should that powerful organization, with all its millions and all the ramifications of its far-reaching power, array itself behind such a movement, do the gentlemen believe that the American people would not rally around that court and give such an approval to the judges as to dazzle the world by the emphasis of their democracy and the splendor of their power? [Prolonged applause.] And if those who are dissatisfied with the Standard Oil decision should invoke the recall, aimed at the court, do the gentlemen imagine that the result would be different? [Applause.]

Yes; Mr. Chairman, recall or no recall, the courts are safe in the care and confidence of the American people. Only the other day a man stood upon the pinnacle of the most amazing popularity ever attained by any son of a republic in history, certainly our history. Men wondered how great his influence and his hold upon popular fancy and admiration would become. He dominated conventions and hurled from party honors the man filling the second highest place in the Government of our country. He applied his masterful political courage and genius to his party and its management, consigned every opponent to oblivion, and still seemed safe in his exalted place. Then he crossed the sea and directed England how to manage Egypt, and it is a wonder he did not tell her what to do with the pyramids or the mummies that are left there. When he had a few moments to spare he stopped at Rome and actually undertook there to reverse the diplomatic traditions of centuries. Then he went to Africa, and men wondered if this man would bring the birds of the air and the beasts of the jungle under his sway.

Back over the ocean he came, and never did Cæsar at the head of his legions receive such a reception as this man received in the first city of the western world. On and on he went until the dream of new nationalism developed and people began to quote what Bryan said in a speech some years ago with a little paraphrasing:

"Awake, Oh Ancient Lawgiver; awake! Break forth from thine unknown sepulcher and speed thee back to cloud-capped Sinai. Commune once more with the God of our fathers. Proclaim again the law written on tables of stone."

For behold, there has risen in the twentieth century a man who is going about with a dispensation that shows that he has rediscovered the Ten Commandments and is fast getting away with them as his own.

[Laughter and applause.]

You, gentlemen, with your fine-spun Hamiltonianism, who fear to trust the people with one more instrumentality of government, listen to this.

In the new nationalism this hero of war and of peace intimated that if the Supreme Court of the United States did not support certain policies which were identified with his administration some way would be found to get judges who would sustain them. And then what happened? One of those characteristic revolutions in American politics took place which tell the story of the fidelity of the people and their devotion to the judiciary. From that moment his popularity began to fail, and it went down, down, until to-day there sits your erstwhile hero as powerless to make or unmake judges or direct the destinies of this Republic as was Napoleon to realize his dream as he stood listening to the melancholy sobbing of the sea around St. Helena. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What conception of rule is that which proclaims the people a mob because they demand more power in the government under which they live? The gentlemen tell us that Lincoln would have been recalled had there been a possibility of it in his day. Pray, from what measure of the patriotism of the country does this proceed? [Applause.] No; Lincoln would not have been recalled, to his disadvantage, any more than he was defeated in the middle of the war, when passion was at its height and the great armies were contending upon many a field of death.

I protest against the meager measure of confidence placed in the American people by the gentlemen who have so industriously searched the writings of Alexander Hamilton for material in this debate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why was Lincoln not defeated? Because the American people were behind him; because he represented American institutions and human liberty, and the American people will never either recall, put out of office, or humiliate a public servant who stands for these things. [Applause.] Yes; and Washington would have been recalled, say the gentlemen, had there been such a possibility in his day; and they might have added that, without doubt, Aaron Burr would have headed the petition; but there stands the fame and splendor of Washington, forever to remain, and who will say that 25 per cent of his countrymen could, if they would, have made it otherwise had they 10,000 recalls? [Applause.]

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the patriotic gentlemen who are now so fearful that the hot-heads of Lincoln's day would have destroyed that great man would, had they been in public life in that eventful era, voted to prevent the hot-heads of their party from recalling, or, worse, impeaching Andrew Johnson, thus saving the Presidency from obloquy and the Government from disgrace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am opposed to the recall because I believe the American people are to be trusted to take care of their Government with the machinery they already have, but God forbid that I should oppose the recall or any other proposition of government because I either doubted or feared the capacity and intelligence of the people to save their institutions from the mob and the demagogue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I warn the gentleman on the other side of this Chamber that this is not a good time in which to try to play a game of politics which has for its purpose the deception of the American electorate. If you undertake to hide behind the mask of patriotic defense of the judiciary, which needs no defense, while you strike at the heart of the Union in the hope of gaining party advantage, the people will understand and to them we shall appeal.

In this day of Democratic awakening exquisite sophistry will not obscure desperate partisanship.

Others may understand the purpose of your course in this debate as they will, but to me it is as clear as the fact that interests that would shout for the flag while they use law for the purposes of plunder are passing from places of power in this country.

To me your course means this monstrous thing: To let New Mexico into the Union automatically, because you believe that from that new State will come two Senators of your party. Keep Arizona out of the Union, not because its constitution is unrepublican or at all repugnant to the spirit of the Nation, but because you fear that two Senators from that new State may be not of your party. But if, by any view of the joint resolution before the House, it should appear to your scheme that there would be added to the Senate two Democratic Senators and two Republican Senators, with the probability that in the swelling tide of Democracy in due time all four Senators might be out of sympathy with standpatism, thus removing forever from the path of American progress the last citadel of privilege, you would then, if possible, keep both of these proposed new States out of the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And when the people of this land come to grasp the full significance of such politics, woe betide the party caught in the act.

Refusing to admit a State into the Union because it might upset the political plans of party is but one step removed from laying down the doctrine that States may be put out of the Union in order to save party from the wrath of an aroused people.

On this issue I would have my party appeal to the American people, who never yet have failed to tear down party standards, as they did in the last election, not so much because they love party government less, but because they love country more. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If, in the name of your party, you shall keep either or both of these States out of the Union in the hope of partisan advantage, all the mock alarm, all your high-browed Hamiltonianism, expressed here in twaddle about the people being likely to destroy the judiciary, will not save that party nor protect you from the fate which inevitably overtakes those who would circumvent democracy when freemen are bent upon applying it to their government and their country. [Prolonged applause.]

REDEEM A NATION'S PROMISE NOW.

More than 60 years ago, Mr. Chairman, Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, holding a commission from the United States, issued a proclamation to the people of New Mexico, in which he said:

We are not going to hurt you; we are going to protect you; we will welcome you as American citizens, with all the rights of American citizens. Come into the United States; take the oath of allegiance.

Then the proclamation added:

Just as soon as possible we are going to establish for you a legislature, and you will pass your own laws, enact your own legislation, and be a self-governing State. As soon as it is possible to do so we are going to establish for you a State government under this authority from the Secretary of War.

That promise, given when war clouds overhung the Nation—the Mexican War—should have been redeemed long ago. I believe that, after many vicissitudes, through none of which this people ever showed a want of those qualities of which States are made, New Mexico is to be admitted to the Union by this Congress, and with her Arizona, in accordance with the provisions of the joint resolution now before this House.

While the aspirations of these States to be represented among the stars of the flag under which their people have won statehood spurs many times over have repeatedly been subjected to disappointment, it may turn out that at no time since Gen. Kearny pledged a Nation's word could either or both of these States have been admitted to the Union under conditions more conducive to statehood or amid environments of more promise to the happiness of those who are to live in the new States. [Applause.]

To have been welcomed into the Union by a House of Representatives which is to be identified in history by the program of high purpose and patriotic service which has been enacted by this House during the past few weeks must forever be an inspiration to the people who shall enjoy the blessings of citizenship in these States and who shall solve their governmental problems in their own way in the coming years of Democracy's expansion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE PASSING OF A POLITICAL SCHOOL.

It is well for the States that are to be admitted to the Union as part of the program enacted here since April 4, 1911, a year of grace in which Democracy's voice came out of the wilderness and began to preach from the mountain heights the gospel of true government among the free. [Prolonged applause.]

From the beginning of their statehood let New Mexico and Arizona remember the spectacle of a once great party, a once despotic organization, literally staggering to its end through this session.

Should, for instance, the people of these new States come to grapple with the high cost of living, let them recall what happened to a party which drifted from the service of humanity into the slavery of greed and despotic party rule, only to pay the penalty at the bar of public opinion.

Let them remember, too, that at the time they were admitted to the Union, in one application of Democratic doctrine, embodied in justice and law, the Supreme Court of the United States, figuratively speaking, began to draw the teeth of monopoly and to bid it loose its clutch upon the throats of the people. [Applause.]

THE FORCE OF GOOD EXAMPLE.

We would, Mr. Chairman, have these new States apply to their public questions a broader and more elevating view than that which must cling to the records of this session as the view of a passing and repudiated school of government. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], whose long service in public life and whose courage in political adversity will never, I hope, receive an unkind word from me or from his country, sounded the full, strong note of the political school against which the old States will surely be armed in the future, and which the new States may remember with profit. In the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on reciprocity with Canada, we were told that the premier of Canada had urged the reciprocity pact on the ground that it would benefit the Canadian farmer. In the same speech we were told that the President of the United States had urged the adoption of the reciprocity treaty with Canada on the ground that it would help the American farmer. Right there the passing political school touched the limitation of its vision. Let future students of this speech, great in picturesque reminiscence and characteristic eloquence, ask which of the two, the premier of Canada or the President of the United States, did the gentleman from Illinois believe. This must be the natural question, since it is clear that nowhere in the horizon of the statesmanship for which this school stands is there any vision of the fact that both are right, and that the premier of Canada and the President of the United States are trying to bring closer together in the cementing relations of trade and neighborliness two great peoples, entitled to all the blessings intended for all whose fortunes are bound up with this land, and to whom government means vastly more than high tariff walls and exact and exacting trade schedules. [Prolonged applause.]

From this Congress the new States may take inspiration, and political philosophy, too. As their people peruse in the future the record of the Congress which admitted their States to the Union, I fancy I hear them giving thanks that they have risen to a higher conception of the United States Government than to preach the doctrine so ably elucidated on this floor by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], whose alarms arose from the story that there are certain tariff dodgers who drive sheep across the Canadian border, shear them in the United States, and drive the shorn creatures back again, in consequence of which dire proceeding the prosperity of 92,000,000 of people must vanish like a blossom in a tempest, and American institutions, from the dome of this Capitol to the Statue of Liberty and the customhouses, must inevitably come tumbling down as if in chaotic answer to Gabriel's trumpet. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Let the new States take their amusement from this school of wolf-crying statesmanship, and their inspiration to development from the doctrine of confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the people who are to bear the burdens, and therefore deserve the blessings, of statehood in this Union.

THE STANDPATTERS OF OTHER DAYS.

Some of the difficulties which these and other States have encountered in their ambitions to become States may be noted as bearing upon the educational, if not the political, situation of to-day with regard to these proposed new Commonwealths. New Mexico is no stranger, certainly, to opposition in her march to statehood.

In the Senate of the United States, March 23, 1848, Daniel Webster said:

I am against all accession of territory to form new States. We admitted Texas—one State for the present—but, sir, if you refer to the resolution providing for the annexation of Texas, you will find a provision that it shall be in the power of Congress hereafter to make four new States out of Texan territory. Present and prospectively, five new States, with 10 Senators, may come into the Union out of Texas. Undoubtedly, if we take, as the President recommends, New Mexico and California, there must then be four new Senators. We shall then have provided, in these Territories out of the United States, enough to send 14 Senators into this Chamber.

But then, sir, suppose Texas to remain a unit and but one State for the present, still we shall have six Senators, then, for less than 300,000 people.

That the vision of the greatest minds of that day should have been limited regarding the possibilities of the Republic may be explained only by understanding the question of slave territory, which then engaged the statesmanship of the time, and to settle which the greatest civil war in history was to come. Still, while we are admitting States to the Union in our own day, and having perhaps reached the last to be admitted in a century, we may well contemplate history as it sets forth the very duty before this House. Listen to Webster speaking of New Mexico:

As to New Mexico, its population is not likely to increase. It is a settled country, the people living along in the bottom of the valley on the sides of a little stream, a garter only on one side, and the other filled by coarse landholders and miserable peons. It can sustain, not only under this cultivation, but under any cultivation that our American race will ever submit to, no more people than are there now. There will then be two Senators for 60,000 inhabitants in New Mexico to the end of our lives, to the end of the lives of our children. * * * Forty-nine fiftieths, at least, of the whole of New Mexico are barren waste—a desert plain or mountain with no wood or timber. Little fagots for lighting a fire are carried 30 or 40 miles on mules.

And how is it with California? We propose to take California from the forty-second degree of north latitude down to the thirty-second. We propose to take 10 degrees along the coast of the Pacific. Scattered along the coast for that great distance are settlements and villages and ports, and in the rear is all wilderness and Indian country.

I have never heard of anything, I can not conceive of anything more ridiculous in itself, more absurd and more affrontive to all sober judgment, than the cry that we are getting indemnity by the acquisition of New Mexico and California. I hold they are not worth a dollar, and we pay for them vast sums of money.

And what if the voice of Webster pleading for standpatism in statehood had been potent then? Answer, New Mexico, with the results of your industry in peace and your devotion to duty in war, with your 100,000 school children, representing homes in which race suicide is regarded as untrue to civilization and morality as it is destructive of happiness and the State.

Answer, California, with your City of the Golden Gate rising above the desolation of the earthquake and making forever glorious the Pacific slope.

Answer, Arizona, with your accumulated merits, your independence and manifold equipments for statehood in the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Well may we in this body, in which the majority expresses the protest of the American people against standpatism in another, but no less menacing form, recall from history the admission of other States. There were those who would have "stood pat" on the original thirteen States. There were those whose standpatism had to be ignored by Jefferson in the greatest service ever rendered any country by any statesman—the acquisition of Louisiana. The States that were to be carved from that Territory rose ghostlike in the minds of the stand-pat statesmen of that day.

I will not say that it was the voice of Massachusetts, for that State repudiated the voice and despised the sentiment from that day to this; but listen to Josiah Quincy, of the same State which gave Webster to fame.

January 14, 1811, an eventful century ago, Quincy said, and then committed to writing this sentiment regarding the proposed admission of Louisiana as a State to the Union:

If this bill passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of this Union, that it will free the States from their moral obligation, and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some definitely to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must.

In spite of this prediction the bill passed the House by a vote of 77 to 36, and was signed by President Madison, the Speaker in the meantime having ruled the remarks of Quincy out of order.

Pitiful and petulant, sordid and unpatriotic as was this attitude of opposition to the admission of Louisiana, it constituted a standpatism of that day, not a whit more distrustful of the ability of the American people to govern than is the standpatism of to-day of the rights of the people to enjoy equal opportunity in the struggle incident to life in a rapidly developing country. Josiah Quincy's prediction was not altogether unlike the "smokeless chimney, desolate hearthstone, sheep shearing, and ruined industries" alarm of to-day.

Late but lucky New Mexico and Arizona, to be welcomed into statehood in the effulgent morning of a new youth for Democracy in this Republic. [Applause.]

A STATE SHOULD MAKE ITS OWN CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Chairman, the obstacles in the way of the admission of New Mexico and Arizona at this time are and have been trivial in comparison to those which other Territories had to overcome in order to get into the Union. I shall not enter into a discussion of the constitutions which, under the enabling acts, these States have made. This joint resolution voices the hope and affords the opportunity for further expression of the people's will in the proposed States upon features which, upon second thought, may seem to them to be more republican in form as recommended by this resolution than they may have seemed at the time of adoption. To provide in a State constitution that before any citizen of the State can hold high public office who does not speak a certain language may or may not have seemed to the authors of the enabling act, in accordance with which such a provision appears in the constitution of New Mexico, to be republican in form and meaning.

So far as I could gather from the hearings on this constitution before the Committee on the Territories, and published to the country, it was the general desire to be admitted to the Union and not the details of the constitution which had most to do with influencing the vote on the adoption of the constitution. This change and the further opening of the opportunities of the State for all the people of every language are to be voted upon as one of the conditions of the admission to the Union of New Mexico. The right to vote for or against the proposed changes remains with the people of the State without prejudice as to admission.

The obstacle in the way of the speedy admission of Arizona is that of the indecision in the mind of the President of the United States with regard to the sanction of the recall as applied to members of the judiciary. While I recognize room for difference as to the question here involved, personally I believe that there is another question of far more importance to the life of this Nation than any of these; it is bound up in this situation, and that is the right of every State to its own constitution, made and to be lived under by the people of the State without interference so long as such constitution does not conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

If I lived in Arizona, feeling as I do now regarding the recall, I should vote against its application to judges.

If I lived in New Mexico, I would vote and, if necessary, fight for a constitution which left open to all worthy citizens the right to sit in the legislature or in any other seat of honor and responsibility in the State. [Applause.]

But, sir, if living in New Mexico, Arizona, or New York, I felt that the right of the people of the State to have their own constitution was being violated or that the people of the State were being restricted in the liberties to which they are entitled under the Federal Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, I would say, "Never accept of any advantage, even that of statehood in the Union, under conditions that would weaken us as a State or humiliate us as a people." [Prolonged applause.]

And, sir, did I not know that the changes proposed by this joint resolution in no way interfere with the progress of these people to statehood, but rather give fresh opportunity to emphasize their will and to answer with their votes as to what they thought of their critics and of their principles, I would not vote for those changes here or elsewhere.

THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

Neither shall I discuss, Mr. Chairman, the merits or demerits of the initiative and referendum. I have no difficulty, however, in accounting for the demand on the part of the people of various States, including the Republicans of New Jersey, for the application of that instrumentality of government in their affairs. Speaking on the evening of May 1 of this year, at a gathering in Princeton, N. J., and in the presence of a distinguished advocate of the initiative and referendum, Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, whose power for good furnishes an illustrious example of the mission of the scholar in politics, and whose fighting qualities fire the Democratic heart to the passion of combat for reform [applause], a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States said in a speech which the press carried as an attack upon Gov. Wilson's ideas of government:

There is much clamorous advocacy of measures to limit the powers of those charged with the administration of our highly complicated Government and to increase the direct intervention of the public in the conduct of its operations.

Sure enough. Upon what right do the people clamor for more direct power in government? It is the old question of Hamiltonianism, which never fails to be heard when the people, driven to casting from their shoulders unjust burdens, rise up to drive plutocracy from power and to open wider the doors of government for those who believe that the people are not without capacity to govern. [Prolonged applause.]

If the "clamor" for the initiative and referendum has done nothing else at this time, it has served to bring out the aristocratic doctrine of Hamilton, that it may be measured by the proportions of the Democracy now sweeping over the country, just as it was measured and judged in its conflict with Thomas Jefferson in the early morning of that trust in the people which is the soul of the party represented by this majestic majority which is to give its approval to New Mexico and Arizona, together with admission to the Union. [Applause.]

This Cabinet member, Attorney General Wickersham, of my own State of New York, went on to tell how it happened that, in the midst of great prosperity, things occurred. Let me quote his words, as given to the press.

The Attorney General spoke of the recent colossal commercial development on centralized lines:

It is no wonder—

He said—that materialism became rampant and that the golden calf was erected for worship in the market places. But the vision of truth and justice has never wholly failed before the eyes of the American people. In the period of their greatest material progress they paused to consider whether their institutions were securing justice between man and man. The laws of State and Nation alike, during this period of great industrial progress, had been molded to facilitate the conduct of business on a colossal scale. There was nothing more natural. They met the needs of the hour.

Thus plausibly and eloquently, as becomes the school of which this is typical political philosophy, the speaker led up to what, I submit, is at once the answer to the question, Why are the people clamoring for additional powers in government? This is what the Attorney General said in his splendid way:

Here and there occasional peaks of garnered riches rose high above the plain, and, like the robber barons of the Rhine land, great masters of capital sat enthroned upon them. But their very height lifted them up where all men could see and begin to question how they came there.

Yes, indeed, this questioning of "how they came there" is that which we read, like a guide sign, on the highway along the road of Democracy's progress. It is the voice of the people asking if the time has not arrived for throwing around Democracy still stronger safeguards, that it may not perish in the battle with greed and privilege, twin enemies of republics. So that Hamiltonianism, in its most eloquent advocacy of itself, justifies the very clamor of which it complains. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me repeat, lucky New Mexico, lucky Arizona, to be admitted to the Union by a Congress in which the school of government that would limit the people's participation in their affairs to the needs and convenience of the favored few has been reduced to a minority whose opposition is futile and whose doctrines are literally swept away by the tide of popular protest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that I would not enter upon a discussion of the initiative and referendum, but as the question raised by the constitutions of proposed new States is whether or not such constitutions are republican in form and not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence, I desire to insert in my remarks a statement sent to the New York World, a brilliant and powerful opponent of the initiative and referendum, by a distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, Senator OWEN, in whose State the law is now in effect:

SENATOR OWEN'S STATEMENT.

Is the initiative and referendum constitutional? Mr. Fred A. Baker, of Detroit, thinks it is not. The only possible ground for this absurd contention is the plea that the constitutional provision (Art. IV, sec. 4) that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government" is inconsistent with the initiative and referendum; that is to say, that the initiative and referendum is not "republican" in form.

The guaranty of a republican form was agreed upon in the constitutional convention as a protection against a monarchy or an oligarchy.

"The term 'republican' has been applied to political organizations representing the most adverse principles.

"During the years 1781–92, under the leadership of Jefferson, the exponents of decentralization in the National Government called themselves Republicans and later became the Democratic Party. The term 'republican' was most conspicuously used as applied to the party organized in 1854–1856, which elected Lincoln in 1860."

Lincoln himself, the leader of that party, upon the field of Gettysburg raised to Heaven a mighty prayer, which has been heard around the world, for the preservation of a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." Lincoln emphatically believed in the initiative and referendum, and so expressed himself.

The terms "Democrat" and "Republican" are synonymous, the Jefferson party having assumed the official name "Democratic-Republican," and later being called Republicans and finally becoming the Democratic Party.

The terms "Democratic" and "Republican" both mean, in fact, the rule of the people.

The guaranty of a republican form was inserted in the Constitution on the motion of Gov. Randolph, of Virginia. Mr. Madison moved an amendment as follows, and it was adopted:

"The republican constitutions and the existing laws of each State to be guaranteed by the United States." (Elliott's Debates, p. 543.)

Gov. Randolph explained why he was for the amendment, and said: "A republican government must be the basis of our National Union, and no State in it ought to have it in its power to change it into a monarchy." In letter No. 43, Hamilton, Madison, and Jay explained in the Federalist that this was "republican," defending this expression and saying: "The superintending government ought to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchial innovations."

Letter No. 39 is of like purport.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Constitution, section 1815, explains that this term "republican" was used in contrast with "aristocratic" or "monarchial."

Mr. Justice Cooley, in Constitutional Limitations, explains the purpose of the guaranty of republican form to protect the Union against "aristocratic and monarchial innovations."

In Hopkins v. Duluth (81 Minn., 189) the court said: "We apprehend that a little reflection must satisfy anyone that the advantages of providing local self-government by the voters directly interested through a referendum is abstractly as well as concretely more republican in form than through representatives of the people in the legislature."

The Supreme Court of the United States (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 421) declared that the republican character of a State, when recognized by the proper constitutional authority, is binding on every other department of the Government, and it can not be questioned in a judicial tribunal.

Fourteen of the States have actually adopted the initiative and referendum by a popular vote or act of the legislature.

It was, however, a recognized doctrine of the original States, the constitutions themselves being adopted by the referendum, the initiative being exercised in the right of instruction in the town meetings of New England and the county conventions of the South.

The right of recall was also recognized by the Continental Congress (Art. V), in which the States expressly reserved the right to recall their delegates to Congress at will.

The Congress of the United States admitted Oklahoma with the initiative and referendum and as a State "republican in form," and Congress has recognized Oregon, Maine, Montana, South Dakota, Missouri, Arkansas, and Oklahoma; and notwithstanding that these States have the initiative and referendum as constitutional provisions, their representatives are not questioned in Congress. Congress recognizes these States as republican in form, and this recognition is binding upon every other department of the Government, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. (Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700; Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U. S., 546.)

The rule of the people and their right to rule is recognized in all the constitutions. (See the bill of rights of North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Vermont, New Jersey, Delaware, South Carolina, and Georgia.)

The evidence is overwhelming, and the contention of Mr. Baker is so unsound as to not require any further answer, although further evidence is abundant.

ROBERT L. OWEN.

WASHINGTON, April 11.

THE AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

The question as to the method and possibility of amending the constitution submitted by New Mexico was chiefly involved in the hearings before the Committee on the Territories, and as a consequence of the discussions a change in article 19 of the constitution has been suggested in the joint resolution before the House. I asked the gentlemen who had been instrumental in framing this constitution in what respects it differed from the constitutions of other States in the Union in the possibilities of amendment. On this point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to introduce some facts prepared by the Hon. A. B. Fall, of New Mexico, and given to me at my request as showing what various State constitutions provide on this point.

Mr. Chairman, in introducing comparisons of the constitutions of the various States as to how the people may amend them I say in connection with it that I listened to the speech of my eloquent and learned colleague on the committee on the other side of the House [Mr. WILLIS] yesterday; and while I do not remember all he said about constitutions, I do know that he found that in some States it took two sessions of the legislature and a majority vote to amend the constitution. In other States it took less; in other States it took more. In some States they did this and in other States they did that; and so, around the whole Union, it developed that the people of the States were actually living under constitutions made by themselves just as they wanted them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That was far more significant and a far greater contribution to this discussion than all the legal hairsplitting and adroit technicalities which I suspect are somewhere being woven into one of those subtle and flimsy excuses for a dying political party to keep up its strength in the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A NATION'S DUTY.

Party platforms have repeatedly declared for the admission of these States to the Union. Let us redeem our pledges and admit them now. For all time let it be said of these States that they were born in the throes of a political revolution against greed in business and dishonor in politics. Admitted to the Union by this Congress, their birth will be found by the student of the future to have taken place while yet the pathetic cries of a once great party, born for the work of liberty but wrecked upon the shoals of covetousness, echoed through the Nation's Capitol. [Applause.]

If there be anything in the environment of birth, it will be well for the States born at the close of these debates.

This session is to be remembered in history as one in which a small group of standpatters, relics of a past and repudiated school of government and of political economy, united in a pitiful effort to thwart a majority, direct from the people, by dangling before patriotic visions the skeleton of a policy which students will forever know as the prolific "mother of trusts."

Mr. Chairman, somewhere it has been said "history makes itself; men only write it." The thought is too shallow, the conclusion too weak. As well might it be said that governments make themselves; men only frame them. In the admission of the two last States to the Union in our time we are making history, and may it be enduring to the strength and perpetuity of our country.

New Mexico and Arizona, this Democratic House of Representatives bids you welcome to the Union. Forevermore be represented among the stars of the most beautiful banner that ever waved between earth and sky. It is the banner whose united stars gleam as a beacon of hope to the oppressed of every land and under whose shadow liberty dwells and justice reigns. It is the banner for which the Father of his Country prayed that it might triumph over tyranny, through every danger withstand the enemies of the Republic, and vindicate the inalienable rights of mankind.

Come, New Mexico and Arizona, enter into the Union, for whose mission heroes have sanctified with their blood the battle fields of a Nation. Come, make still more invincible, still more beautiful the American flag, the truest banner of freedom, the sweetest emblem of hope since the cross cast its redeeming shadow upon a lonely hill. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I now yield half an hour to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it would be ungracious to mar the sublime effect of such a grand oration as that to which we have just listened by feebler effort from a weaker man. That maiden speech by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONNELL] has established his position as a statesman and orator, and the wonder to me is, after hearing his masterful discussion, that if he has been preaching the doctrine of Democracy with such truth and power in his State, his State could ever have gone Republican a single time. [Laughter and applause.] He and the other distinguished gentlemen who have been heard to-day have spoiled what little speech I thought I wanted to make by saying all that was good in it and a great deal more that I never could or would have said. To try to follow them would be tedious to my hearers. I could not add materially to what they have said; I would not answer it if I could, and no man could answer it if he would. [Laughter and applause.]

For a long time we have trifled with New Mexico and Arizona, making them promises and deceiving and disappointing their hopes. Through the majestic declaration of the will of the people this House is at last in a position to do its part in according them justice. If it has been decreed by partisanship that because it is imagined that New Mexico is Republican and that Arizona is Democratic, that New Mexico shall be admitted and Arizona rejected, argument and reasoning will be of no avail; but if the other branch of this Congress and the Executive see proper to act in that way about it for the sake of a few Members of Congress and a few electoral votes in the next election, I beg to assure them that the people of this whole Union will register a Democratic victory with such overwhelming unanimity as to render unnecessary to Democratic success in Congress and the White House the votes of either of these Territories. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I regard every argument and every objection which I have heard against this resolution as demurrable, and believe that any good lawyer, sworn and placed on that bench as a judge, would so hold. The pending resolution is not a Democratic proposition. The Democratic position is that both ought to be admitted if their constitutions provide for a republican form of government, and be left free to do as they please as to all local questions in detail. But this resolution is gotten up as a compromise. There was a difficulty between the President of the United States and the divergent Houses of Congress on the question, and the result is that this is gotten up as a compromise, which ought to be accepted by everybody to make peace in the premises.

The objections I have heard are demurrable for this reason: When 13 sovereign States, for unmistakable purposes, clearly declared in the preamble, formed a union and adopted a Constitution, they expected to grow; they expected the population to multiply and prosperity to increase their wealth and power, to carve out new States from themselves and from additional territory, and they made provision that Congress may admit new States, and the other provision applicable to new and old States, that a republican form of government should be guaranteed to every State. It is not expressly declared that Congress could not arbitrarily exercise the physical power to say, "Because the details of your constitution do not suit the particular personal or sectional notions of some Member of Congress we will not admit you"; but, by implication, it is clearly understood that if the constitution presented provides for government republican in form, it is the duty of Congress to admit that State.

Mr. Chairman, I do not hear much objection to the details of the New Mexico constitution. The chief one is that they try to imitate the Greek lawgiver of old, who had a compact that the law as he gave it should not be changed; but, Mr. Chairman, that itself is a nullity. The power of changing a constitution is inherent in any people, and the people of any State at any time, no matter what the language of their constitution is, can change it.

As to Arizona, I have heard gentlemen urge three objections. They do not like the initiative; they do not like the referendum; they do not like the recall. Mr. Chairman, it is not a sufficient objection that any of these gentlemen object to any of these details or any other detail for any reason. A great many of them come from States that say things and do things that I do not like, but I do not propose to move to expel them from the Union on that account. As long as their States maintain republican forms of government the detail is a matter for them, and the bedrock, the corner stone of our political system—the admiration of the world, the boon of mankind—is local self-government. Each community may do as it pleases so long as it conforms to the general system of representative government.

And what do these things mean? The lexicographer has not performed during this debate. The initiative is supposed, in its essence, to mean simply a suggestion and indication of what the people would like to have done. That is all. There is not a Member here who is not anxious to find out what the people on whom he depends for election want done. The referendum means that if a matter is agitated on which the people have not spoken and there is any doubt or dispute, then it should be referred to the people to find out what they want done about it. The last one of you keeps your ear to the ground more assiduously than the track dog every kept his nose to the scent of the game to find out what the views and notions of the people are. As to the recall, it means the power to call down a public servant, and call him out if he is not doing right, and it is applicable already in one form or another to every solitary elective office in the United States, Federal or local, from the President down to constable.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. FIELDS. Does not the gentleman think that the recall that the people exercised in the election of Representatives last fall added a good deal to the dislike which certain gentlemen on that side entertain to the principle of recall?

Mr. ADAMSON. I was just about to remark that I thought two years was perhaps a short enough period to exercise the power of recall on Congressmen. Under existing law periods vary in length for the different offices, and gentlemen on the other side are doubtless justifiable in opposing the idea at all, or at least making the period any shorter than two years, from the terrific experience they had last fall, which decimated their ranks to one-half and restored this House to the control of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But that is not a circumstance to what they are going to suffer if they persist in disregarding the will of the people. If they insist upon the same mad career which caused the storm of last year, the people will rise in their might and resentment next year and recall the balance of them, and you will hardly find room in this entire House for the Democratic Congressmen who will be sent here to take the place of the unfaithful Representatives justly recalled. [Applause.]

Oh, the gentleman from Michigan, my eloquent brother HAMILTON, inveighed terrifically about the dangers of a terrified judiciary, afraid of the people, pandering to popular whim and caprice, trimming judicial sails to suit the popular wind, and denying justice to litigants through fear of recall. His picture did not appall me. In a great many States, my own included, the judges are all elective. The same troubles which he depicted about a miscarriage or suspension of justice incident to a change in incumbency applies with equal force to every case where the judiciary is elective. We have no trouble about it. We trust the people. They usually do right. Neither Arizona, when admitted, nor any other State of this Union, will ever permit a judge to be summarily recalled through popular caprice nor removed during the term for which elected without due notice and fair trial. I hope the Lord will long postpone the day when we will have in this country either Congressmen or judges who "forget the rock from which they were hewn" and imagine they are independent of the people whose servants they are. It is wholesome. The emphatic purpose of our Government, State and Federal, was to provide a check and curb upon its public servants in order that they would do the people's will.

The entire burden of my song is that it is none of our business what particular details the people of Arizona want in their State government, provided they present those features which are characteristic of a representative form of government. We ought to admit any such State in any such condition if it is justified by the population and power, and welcome it into the sisterhood of States on the same terms, with all the rights, powers, privileges, and immunities of an original State and say: "My sister, come in, grow, live, prosper as one of us, and do your duty and exercise your rights, powers, privileges, and immunities in this glorious Union." The trouble with us has been eloquently referred to by the last speaker, and it is that there were some people in this country wedded to the doctrines of monarchy and class and absolutism, and they fought and struggled to form and shape this Government upon that idea. They failed. Instead of submitting, as a patriotic and honest minority ought to have done, they went on from the very beginning of the Government and up to this hour endeavoring to conduct it on those principles which had been overruled and rejected in framing our Government.

They are in this House to-day advocating the pharisaical doctrine that has caused all trouble and bloodshed in this country—that you must look after other people's morals and other people's concerns and neglect your own. The true doctrine is that you ought to keep your own yard clean, you ought to attend to your own business, and do your part in governing your country by managing your own local affairs, and thereby contribute your part honestly to the entire sum of the greatness, glory, and prosperity of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A good, old, honest Republican Senator, if such an apparent anomaly in expression may be pardoned [laughter], asked me this morning if the Lord was on our side over here. I said, "Most assuredly; He has come around to us at last. He is helping us put through some good bills, and we will soon send them over to you, and then I do hope the Divinity will move over to your vicinity and move your hearts to do right and serve Him by executing the people's will. The pagan gods used to make mad those whom they wished to destroy. If He does not help you and move your hearts to put through at this time the beneficial and salutary measures which we are sending over to you, it may be that He is showing his great divine goodness and wisdom of dispensation by allowing you a little more time to do a little more harm and a little more evil and a little more violation of the people's will in order to justify your own doom and demonstrate the greatness, goodness, power, and justice of His dispensation when He moves the people to destroy you utterly in the next election." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 14, the statehood resolution, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HARDWICK, until June 1, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORRISON, for 15 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BELL of Georgia, for 15 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. UTTER, for two weeks, on account of important business.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. There has been some dispute as to whether the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers could be elected by the House. An examination of the statutes clearly shows that the two members from the House are appointed by the Speaker and the two from the Senate are appointed by the Vice President. Therefore, to clear up any difficulty as to the legality of the proceeding, the Chair appoints Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland and Mr. MCCREARY of Pennsylvania as members of this joint committee on the part of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that this might not be a political question, but somehow it seems to me that it has drifted into that. I can not understand the strenuous position of the other side with reference to Arizona, demanding that by our present action we adopt a course which would deny admission of that Territory into the Union as a State because it may have some provision which they do not as individuals approve, when they admit that Arizona may come in as a State without that provision, and as soon as it is a State adopt the very provision that they now object to. The reason, the obscuring reason given for their position is, that gentlemen do not wish to be placed in the attitude of approving a certain provision of that constitution. To obviate that tender, conscientious objection, the majority have provided that the passage of this bill will not be an approval of any provision in either constitution but, as a whole, both constitutions are in effect disapproved so that no tender conscience may be offended. It reminds me, if you will pardon me a little light allusion, of a parent very seriously objecting to the wedding ceremony of his daughter with some unlikely suitor, and saying to that daughter, "You shall not wed in my house and under my rooftree, but you may run away and marry him if you please." For my part, I would rather the child would marry under my own roof and shelter, even though I did not approve the groom, than to tell her, "All right, my daughter, chase away and marry by the light of the moon." That is the attitude these gentlemen place themselves in. They all agree that if Arizona is admitted as a State, with no provision in her constitution for the recall of judges, she may as soon as she becomes a State amend her constitution, and make her judges subject to recall. I am told that some strong opponents of the recall have even advised her to that course. Such action with such advice seems to me too puerile for serious men to consider.

Gentlemen, had this debate been conducted on the usual planes, without such frequent interruptions as have been indulged in, it would have been a memorable debate in the annals of Congress, because it has called for the discussion of great fundamental principles of government. Great questions are involved, and we find represented here two different schools of thought—or citizenship, if you please.

One of these schools represents stability without progress or change. It represents that class of our citizens that point always to precedent and never to present conditions. They stand for stability and for consistency; for constancy and for continuity; for unchangingly following the ways and the paths our fathers trod, whatever may be the altered conditions under which we may live. One of these schools, I say, stands for stability without progress or change. Its followers run in a rut. They want the same methods; they want the old law of fellow-servant's liability as to corporations; they want no public schools.

In my early boyhood days I remember hearing it stated that under the Democratic teaching you had no right to tax one man for the purpose of schooling the children of another. But, thank God, Democrats and Republicans and all citizens have gone beyond that point and have recognized that the public has an interest in the education and training of the children of the land. In my early days it was declared that the parent had the right to dispose of the labor, and almost of the life, of the child, and we had no child-labor laws; and a hundred years of struggle were required in England to raise that great people out of the old rut under which children were made worse than slaves in the great factories of the old mother country.

In the olden times the judges of courts wore gowns, and the ermine enshrouded the person of the judge to add to his dignity and to insure him the respect of the populace, whether he was inherently entitled to it or not. In that day we had the law of primogeniture, by which the oldest son inherited all the estates of his father as a necessity for the preservation of the institutions and great estates of old England, a liberty-loving country always.

From following the mere rut-like routine there came a day when our fathers became revolutionists. They were not like some of us—bound by eternal precedents—but they had an initiative of their own, and stood out [applause on the Democratic side], and did something. Suppose they had said that all the past is sacred and no change can be made without destruction of our fundamental institutions? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is, however, along that line not a little of human nature. Our fathers saw fit to make changes for themselves, but they, too, like their fathers before them, sought to bind posterity a little bit more than posterity is willing to be bound. Consequently when our fathers established this great Federal Government and all the original State governments they put fetters upon the wrists of their posterity that ought to be stricken off, and if we have the initiative and the manhood that our fathers had we will do as they did. We will strike off the shackles. We live in a broader light than they. We will do not as they did, but we will strike the shackles from ourselves and from our children also. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There were peculiar reasons that induced the founders of the Federal Government to make a hidebound and unchangeable Constitution. There were the great dividing interests of the slaveholding and the nonslaveholding communities. There was also the fact of the existence of small States and large States. The question of State's sovereignty was also involved and the jealous effort to guard the rights of the little individual States. Little Rhode Island hung out for years after the rest of the States had ratified the Constitution and had come into the Union. North Carolina, always jealous of her liberty and prerogatives, waited long before she entered the door from which it might be there would be no exit. To preserve the sovereignty of the States, to forever render it impossible to deprive them of that sovereignty, our fathers made an iron Constitution and said that it should not be altered, except, first, by an amendment supported by a two-thirds vote of each House of this Congress, one of them being the Senate, in which the littlest State in the Union had a representation as big as the largest, and the other the House, representing all the people.

Then they said that for the further guarding of the sovereignty of the States, and in order to show these States that we are not seeking to take away their individuality, we will not permit any amendment to become effective to this constitution until three-fourths of all the individual States have severally ratified the amendment; and the Constitution of the United States is presented as an analogy and the only one in history for difficulty of amendment to the constitution of New Mexico. The Constitution of the United States was made almost impossible of amendment, because it embodies the spirit and the design and the purpose of its framers when they built it to protect the sovereignty and the individuality and independence of the several States.

Is it a fair example? Is it an apt illustration? Is it a just comparison? Are we willing to take it in our own States as the guide of our own action and conduct?

Sir, there is another school of thought that advocates progress and change without reference to stability, and that school of thought is anarchy. It is the school of thought that regards nothing as sacred; that would not refer to a former decision of a court; or, in the language of some popular leader of the day, would take all our court records and decisions and burn them in one great holocaust in order that we might start anew without the light of history or precedent.

There is a third school—to which I hope I belong—that believes in stability, but also believes in progress. We may advance in agriculture, and we have in the appliances and in the various methods and in the knowledge with which we pursue that great branch of industry. We have advanced in the great art of transportation; we have advanced in science. Why not advance in governmental methods, and yet preserve stability in harmony with the eternal march of an upward aspiring civilization toward nobler forms, better methods, and higher ideals? [Applause.]

It has been well said here that as to our Federal Constitution we have practically had but one amendment of it since its inception. The first 12 amendments were adopted almost coeval with its adoption, and it was fairly well understood they would be adopted when the Constitution itself was adopted, so that the original Federal organic law and the first 12 amendments were part and parcel of the great Revolution that gave us our freedom from the mother country, and we have had to that great instrument only three other amendments, which were the outgrowth and result of a revolution that shook this country to its center and filled a million graves on the south and north sides of the great dividing line. Shall those who themselves are unable to lift themselves out of a rut bind their posterity in such a manner, by such a constitution that they can only escape from its fetters by revolution? This country has been ripe and anxious now for 10 years, yea more, to amend our Federal Constitution so as to give us an election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, but we can not do it. [Applause.] Our wrists are bound, the chains are about our necks. We have been anxious for lo these many years to adopt a constitutional amendment to permit direct taxation, in order to support the great expenditures of this Government, to place its burdens in part on the shoulders of the strong and powerful, and in part to do away with a system that is corrupting in its influence, but we can not do it. We have an amendment submitted, but God only knows whether the requisite number of States will yet come to the rescue and enable us to adopt that amendment giving us the right to tax wealth instead of poverty.

Shall we follow that example in the establishment of a constitution for a single State, inhabited by a single people? Why, these men who refer to this ancient precedent would, if it were in their power, make even a county government or city charter incapable of alteration if they followed the logic of their own position.

No; the world moves, and if we are men of our time we move with it. I want to say that I favor progress; I want to say that there may come a time—while I myself individually think it impolitic and do not believe it is desirable—when we may reach female suffrage. What man here would say that any State had no right to bestow it?

There are thousands of problems arising, and incidentally let me say that if this age can not achieve something more than our fathers achieved in a less enlightened age then we are degenerate sons of noble sires.

I believe that the time will come when honest labor may always win honest bread. Just how it will be provided I do not know, but humanity's cry will be heard. Once I did not think that the Government had any right, to interfere with the right of private contract; I thought if by the power of your position you could grind me down until I must work for a pittance and starve for a living, provided you wrought under the semblance of free contract, it was your business and mine, and if a parent ground his pitiful children's bones into the dust it was all right. No, no; we have reached a higher plane than that. [Applause.] This world must progress, and as the leading Nation of the earth we should set it an example in the walks of freedom and the march of upward civilization. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, there are two constitutions before us. The so-called conservatives object to one, and the so-called progressives object to the other. The objectors to one of these constitutions fear the people, and the objectors to the other constitution fear the special and corrupt interests. [Applause.] The objectors to one fear that under it the people are given too much power; the objectors to the other fear that under it the people are bound by unbreakable chains.

Let me read you, right here, from a gentleman who is filling some space in the eyes of the public. Mr. Wilson says:

> What we are witnessing now is not so much a conflict of parties as a contest of ideals. * * *
> We generally sum up what we mean by the reactionary forces by speaking of them as embodied in the interests. By that we do not mean the legitimate but the illegitimate interests.

Mr. Wilson places over against the reactionary forces the forces that strive to check and control the great illegitimate interests. In the struggle over these two constitutions we are witnessing this contest of ideals. That would be perfectly clear but for the unfortunate fact that one of these about-to-be States is likely to be Republican and the other is likely to be Democratic in its political complexion; but for that fact, on that side of the aisle as well as on this side of the aisle, the effort, by those who favor progress, would have been to admit both States and to free them from chains of corporate power.

Mr. Wilson continues:

> Let us ask ourselves very frankly what it is that needs to be corrected. To sum it all up in one sentence, it is the control of politics and of our life by great combinations of wealth. Everybody knows, also, that some of the men who control wealth and have built up the industry of the country seek to control politics, and also to dominate the lives of common men in a way which no man should be permitted to dominate.
> In the first place, there is the notorious operation of the bipartisan political machine. I mean the machine which does not represent party principle of any kind, but which is willing to enter into any combination, with whatever group of persons or of politicians, to control the offices of localities and of States and of the Nation itself in order to maintain the power of those who direct it.

And before I get through, if I fail not to do as I intend, I will show that the bipartisan machine was operating in the creation of one of these constitutions. Lest I forget it, I will say that the leading genius in the formation of the New Mexico constitution himself laid the foundation of his own election in his own county by saying that they were not going to allow it to be a party question, and that he would not be a candidate for delegate if party politics was to be involved. It was supposed to be a convention of nonpartisan or bipartisan delegates.

That recalls to me the saying of one of the Goulds, that in Texas he was a Democrat and in New York he was a Republican.

Says Mr. Wilson:

> This machine is supplied with its funds by the men who use it in order to protect themselves against legislation which they do not desire, and in order to obtain the legislation which is necessary for the prosecution of their purposes.

While I am referring to that, I want to call your attention to a brief extract from an article in the Saturday Evening Post, under the title of the "Barred door," which discusses the efforts of New Mexico for the last 40 or 60 years to get into the sisterhood of States.

Referring to a visit of the President to New Mexico and his being entertained by the people, the writer of that article says:

> Among the inevitable speakers was the only A. B. Fall. Ever hear of Fall—Fall, of New Mexico—cowboy, miner, lawyer, judge, gun fighter, able editor, roughrider, farmer, private, chevalier, and brevet captain of industry? Well, you will; in fact, you shall.

And, by the way, I want to say that if there was a master mind connected with the formation of the constitution of New Mexico, it was that of A. B. Fall. I said "if," when I should have said there was a master mind. That is perfectly apparent. It is clear from his own statements and from the statements of all the others that he was busy at work in the committee rooms of his own committee and of all of the other committees all day long and far into the night. When this matter came before your committee Judge Fall was the genius that presided over the hopes of those who sought to have New Mexico enter this galaxy of States without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" or the permitting of people to cross a "t" or dot an "i" in that constitution. The article continues:

> Fall is unique in one respect. He can, with equal ease and nonchalance, carry a safe Republican county for the Democrats, or a safe Democratic county for the Republicans, and then do it all over again. From this you will see he is not a bigoted partisan.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, from what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. HARDY. From an article in the Saturday Evening Post of May 6, 1911; and I will say to the gentleman that I read that for convenience and terseness of expression, rather than anything else, because it expresses the idea that I think nearly every member of our committee on the hearings formed of the great ability, the wonderful ability and versatility of Judge A. B. Fall. I may quote more with reference to that from our hearings. To my mind it was clear from our hearings that in the framing of that constitution there were powerful forces moving outside of and above party politics. They were the forces of the interests.

But, sir, I want to discuss these constitutions. I want to discuss them in the light of present-day ideals. Let us take up the Arizona constitution and the question of the recall. I want to say to some of the gentlemen who have attacked Arizona's constitution that, given a sufficient latitude as to aptness, history may be drawn upon to support the failing cause of any position on almost any question, and it amused me to hear a very eloquent speaker the other day cite as a reason against the doctrine of the recall the fact that Socrates, the great philosopher of the heathen world, was put to death because of his great teachings. The gentleman conveyed the idea that Socrates died at the hands of the common multitude, the people. The gentleman forgot that Socrates was put to death by the Athenian judicial court [applause on the Democratic side]; that he was put to death after an argument for days by a close vote of a body who were supposed to be representatives and to represent the wisdom of Athens. He was put to death not by the people, but by those representatives, and he was put to death on a religious question, which does not stir the blood for a moment only, but divests men of reason when its agitation has reached the point of fervid heat. What has that to do with the doctrine of recall by popular election? He sought to impress us that Aristides the Just was banished by the people because he was just. Why, you can take history and story and legend, and by being a little inaccurate in your facts and subtracting a little here or adding a little there from your fancy weave a web of illustration and analogy to damn or defend any theory. My reading has induced the conclusion that Aristides was one of those fellows who was always spoken of as the great, the just, and the people, so some cynic has said, became impatient that a man should be so paraded, and perhaps so insist on his own virtues, and they did not like it, and they had a popular election. Aristides, a very just man, was not successful in the election; and in those days the man who was successful generally drove out the man who was not successful.

This was no question of recall at all; but if it has any application to our system of government, it is against our whole theory of popular elections. The same thing occurred in Rome. Oh, yes, Rome had her consuls elected every year for the greater part of her growing and progressive existence, but when great men through corrupt means began to overawe the populace then your Sulla and Marius rose, and when Sulla was elected he drove out Marius, and when Marius was elected he drove out Sulla, and that led on to the wars of Cæsar and Pompey. During the days when Rome loved freedom she resorted frequently to the mass of the people, but when finally the reference back to the people was blotted out, when Cæsar was recalled, as you remember, from across the Alps—recalled by the decree of the senate, the representatives of the people, to quiet citizenship, but refused to obey—then he wiped out the doctrine of recall when he crossed the Rubicon with sword in hand; and in wiping out the doctrine of recall he wiped out the liberties of ancient Rome, and for a thousand years Rome knew no recall and knew no freedom. Rome had the initiative, referendum, and recall prior to Cæsar's day; after that, for a thousand years, tyranny and corruption reveled in unbridled and unrestrained license, while the people groveled in chains.

Now, let me say to those who are fighting the doctrine of initiative, referendum, and recall that there is not a State in this Union which has ever been without the doctrine of initiative and referendum. What constitution of any State has been adopted within 50 years without the application of the initiative? What constitution has ever been adopted without the referendum? The people initiate our constitutions, and they are referred to the people, and with the greatest measures of our political existence we practice and we teach the doctrine of initiative and referendum. Everywhere in all this land at the present time the doctrine is extending. It used to be, and what man does not remember the time, when bonds were fixed upon his district or county, or his town, not by the vote and voice of the people but by miscalled representatives of the people. They piled upon us in the South millions of indebtedness by irresponsible so-called representatives, the debts never being referred to our people for ratification or for authorization. As a result you have had in many States an effort at repudiation. Whatever be the fate of any State, God save it from repudiation. But when irresponsible, dishonest representatives beyond the reach of the people put bonds of eternal indebtedness upon the body of the people, the temptation to repudiate is great indeed. In a thousand ways we have had the referendum, and it is only a question among practical statesmen as to what kind of laws are of sufficient importance to justify the people in requiring—what kind of laws are of sufficient importance that the people ought to demand—that they be referred to them. Who should judge of the conditions of a State, of the surroundings of the people, of the importance of the questions, but the people themselves in determining whether this kind of law or that kind of law be referred to them? In my State we refer as little a thing as the stock law to the people of as small a territory as a district, a justice's precinct, or a cut-out district that they mark by boundaries. In my State every county and every precinct may have referred to its people the question of local option. In my State to-day there is a great referendum on the question of State-wide prohibition. What laws shall be referred to the people? Will you stand, as some of you gentlemen do, and say that no law shall be instituted by the initiative of the people or referred to them for ratification or adoption? That is the attitude of the conservatives, who stand for no change from things that were from time immemorial. Why, the doctrine of initiative is nothing more than the perfection of the old right of petition that our fathers in Revolutionary days said was inherent in all free peoples—the eternal right, or the inalienable right, of petition. [Applause.] As to the doctrine of recall, the two years' term of office, with the privilege of reelection—where the discharge of the duties to be performed while holding the office for two years determines the reelection or defeat of the officeholder, what is that but a recall? The faithful servant is retained, the unfaithful is recalled.

There has been a great deal of talk about distinction between a pure democracy and a pure representative government, and to the effect that our fathers in the beginning established a wonderful new thing in representative government. Now, just wipe that cobweb from your mind. There never was an ancient Greek republic, a Roman republic, or Swiss republic, or republic along the coast of the Adriatic Sea or in the marshes where Venice dwells, that was a pure democracy, because no people can perform the multitudinous functions of government in person. No people ever tried to do it. Neither was there ever a pure and unalloyed representative government, except one, and that is the government of an absolute monarchy. The monarch does not look to the people. He rules by divine right, like the "Little Father," the Czar of Russia, who rules for the people, represents them, and with paternal beneficence and deific supremacy and omniscience rules them as their supreme, independent representative. A republic can not be only representative. No republic ever was only representative. In the very act of selecting agents the people act and must act. And in all that the people can act they may act. But between those lines of pure democracy, direct rule by the people, without agents or representatives, and absolute autocracy or monarchy, which is rule by irresponsible masters, lies the ideal republic.

In such a republic the people act directly in many small and large matters—in matters, it may be, of intimate and personal but general concern, and in matters of vital and final importance to the republic. But in such a republic, also, the people must act in many matters of intricate detail and, in many matters of great importance impossible of transaction by the multitude, by and through their agents and representatives; and because they must have them, so much the more important is it that these agents and representatives be true, loyal servants, and that the people retain the power to keep them so.

My philosophy tells me that the more perfectly you can blend direct and representative government, the more perfect your government—a government not lame and futile from cumbrous incapacity, nor yet false and faithless; but true, faithful, and strong, meeting the highest hopes of patriotism and humanity. Such a government only, can be a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Now, let me answer some of the arguments we have had with reference to Arizona. As I said, there are two schools of thought, and they are not divided by party lines. I find that an advocate of one of those schools [Mr. LEGARE] steps out on this side of the aisle and speaks with a boldness and bluntness not equaled by any on that side of the aisle. This school fears the people, as was illustrated most forcibly by the Representative from South Carolina in an hour's talk on the question of the judiciary. The other school trusts the people, and to that school I belong. One says, as said by the gentleman from South Carolina, that you must not give to the people power lest they destroy liberty. The other says that all power is given by the people themselves; that it is theirs without bestowal. One says the legislator, the judge, and the executive must think and act for the people and rule the people. The other says the people must frame the laws for their own government, and the people's representatives, judicial, executive, and legislative, must be faithful exponents of the combined will of the people and must serve rather than rule them. [Applause.]

The gentleman said that the people are always crying for power. "Of course," he said, "they are always crying for power, for more power." Has not that a strange sound from this side of the aisle? He said to give them power meant ruin; to give them power would be to drive the ship of state upon the rocks. Bums, cutthroats, and thieves, he declared, if the power of recall were given the people, would recall the officers and judges elected by the people. The judges and sheriffs would sit in terror, cowering before the popular clamor.

Let me tell the gentleman and those who listened and applauded—and I am frank to say that his applause was liberal, but thankful also to say that it was from the other side of the House—let me say to him and to you, who have an elective judiciary in your States, that every argument made by him against the recall applies with equal force and has been made with equally thundering voice against the election of judges. We have in my State the county judges that have large power over the welfare of our county and people, and those judges are elected every two years. We have our county and district attorneys who have in hand the administration of the criminal laws of the State and the enforcement of those laws, and they are elected every two years. We have district judges elected every four years. Every argument made by the gentleman would tend to make it appear that our judges and prosecuting officers and sheriffs stand in fear and trembling and dare not do their duty when election time is near.

Let me tell you how these officers stand in the light of practical experience. We have had an appointive judiciary as well as the elective in my State. I know them both. I want to tell you that there never was a more fearless set of officials—judges, prosecuting attorneys, and sheriffs—in any State than occupy these positions to-day in the State of Texas. [Applause.] Furthermore, I want to tell you that if you find a judge or a sheriff or a district attorney who hews to the line regardless of where the chips may fall, who does his duty though the heavens fall, that man is the hardest man to beat before our people, and the thieves and thugs and cutthroats do not dare to raise their voice against him. [Applause.]

I know what I am talking about, for I was eight years a prosecuting attorney and eight years a district judge, and I know that in the full and fearless discharge of duty was the strongest argument for my reelection and the strongest appeal I could make for public favor. I sought public approval, and that knowledge gave me power and strength I would not have had had I been merely the creature of some powerful influence. I believe in the people, and believe they will stand behind a brave, true man. I am not exceptional in my belief. Among the strong men that come up from Texas you will find many that filled the positions of prosecuting officers—the attorneys for the county and the district attorneys—who prosecuted fearlessly all thieves and thugs and lawbreakers, and so you can go into all the other States for the same lesson. Where do you find the rise of Folk, of Hughes, and of countless others? It is an unjust indictment of the people to say that a just and fearless judge will be condemned by them.

No; I have no patience with the man who tells me he fears the people; that he fears to submit his ambition to thieves, bums, and cutthroats. Let me tell you, I have heard that argument against elective judges, and I think you will find that the men on this side that oppose the initiative and referendum and oppose absolutely the recall of judges are at heart opposed to the election of judges.

We have nearly everywhere adopted the system of primary elections for nominations. What does it mean? It means that in conventions the people have found they were doing one thing by representatives they could better do for themselves. It means that conventions had come to be the means of corrupt trading and corrupt influences and a method for the service of corrupt bosses. Oh, these gentlemen say they have no patience with the muckraker and the demagogue who denounces everything as corrupt. Neither have I. I hate a liar. But I have no patience with the man who shuts his eyes tightly and says, "There is no corruption in this country, either on the bench or in the executive departments or in the legislative bodies."

How can a man deny the right of recall in the face of recent indictments against members of the Legislature of Ohio and against the members of the legislature of another State, and the conviction from time to time of faithless public officials?

No. I tell you what the primary did in my State, almost—it has not quite done it yet, but it will. It is driving the boss from his seat of power. I very well remember the occasion when an old gentleman came to me and told me that he ran for a county office in my county, and that he went out to a certain part of the county where a very elegant gentleman, with the title of captain, had formerly been in the habit of casting the vote of his whole precinct in the convention. He said to that elegant gentleman, "I would like to have your support for my nomination," and the elegant gentleman assured him that he would have it. But it was a primary election, and when the vote came up, my friend, who trusted in the captain, got only two votes in the precinct.

Your bosses do not go very well with the primary election. That is one effect of more power in the people. If you have the recall, if legislators know that after outraging the wishes of the people by the passage of an iniquitous bill they will have to go before the people again, and if the bill itself may be referred to the people before it becomes a law, they will see the futility of attempting to enact corrupt legislation. What will be the use in attempting to pass infamous bills if the legislator and the law both have to go before the people to be approved by the people? Oh, no. Your referendum and recall may be a great weapon in the hands of the people to protect them against corrupt measures.

Like the primary election, they have the tendency to do away with boss rule, ring rule, and corrupt rule, and to do away with the devotion of so-called representatives to the service of crooked masters and corrupt interests.

In olden times vast interests were not like vampires always ready to suck the lifeblood of the people through their governmental veins. To-day they keep sleepless vigil, and every weapon of defense is needed by the people to protect themselves against greed and corruption.

Those who fear the people say they want the judges appointed and not elected, for fear they will bow and try to please the people. We, on the other side, say we want them elected, so that they will try to please the people.

I do not believe in an appointive judiciary, and I will tell you why. Twenty years ago the then judge in my judicial district, while I was district attorney, died suddenly, and before I had any news of his death I found most of the members of the bar in three counties of the district were arranging plans for filling his unexpired term. As I got off the train to attend a meeting of the court, in ignorance of my friend's death, I was met by a member of the bar already assembled at the courthouse of the county where the court had been in session. They were holding a meeting to get the governor to appoint a member of that bar for the unexpired term, and I was asked to attend. I declined to do so, and when I went into the grand jury room I found the grand jury in conference and consultation. The bar was pushing the appointment of one man, the grand jury was urging the appointment of somebody else, and while these two bodies in one county were making plans, friends of another aspirant in another county got up a petition to the governor and got the judge of their selection appointed. How it happened I do not know. Somebody was better known to the governor; somebody had his kindly ear. There was nothing improper about it, but your appointive judges are selected in that way. I said to myself in the shadow of the death of one of my longest and best friends, "If appointment comes in this unseemly way, where aspirants must begin the scramble to take the shoes of the departed before he is laid in his grave, I want no more appointments." Appointments to the judiciary and the appointive system generally mean that those men prosper best who have learned "to crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But popular election! No man feels humiliated in the least when he stands before his countrymen and says, "I am before you; I ask you for your votes. If I am worthy, give them to me; if not, give them to a worthier man." Oh, no. There is no humiliation about that. But before I would step with pallid brow and faltering tongue to the seat of power and pray for favor, I would stay without the pale of office; and but for the custom that has made it respectable all other independent men would do likewise.

Whom shall our judges please? It is current belief that sometimes in some places judges have been appointed at the solicitation of men interested in certain crooked deals and certain grasping interests. For one I had rather see the honest judge strive to please a great people than to please the petted interests or the power behind the throne. Yes; and I want to say that the judge who does his duty will strive to please not the toughs and bums but the good citizens, and he will strive to do right in order to please them. Where have your corrupt judges been found? In every instance, almost, you will find the corrupt judges either where they have been appointed by legal authority or where they have been foisted on the people through the rule of a corrupt ring or boss. Go to New York or anywhere else, and if you find a judge elected by the free vote of the people, untrammeled by bossism and without corrupt use of money, you will find a good man. The people may sometimes be fooled, but in 99 out of 100 cases you will find the judges so elected to be good men; and the man who does his duty may trust his people for a vindication.

Now I want to call your attention to another thing. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE] indulged in very touching heroics about the stain that would be cast upon a man by a recall from office. I want to tell him that a recall from office is no stain upon the man who is recalled unless there was some ignoble act that caused him to be recalled. Strange indeed was the sound, of a voice in the name of Democracy from the State of South Carolina, in terror of the people and in denunciation of a free people who might dare to assert their right of recall to recall a faithless agent or servant. Would the gentleman from South Carolina dare to recall an agent or servant of his own if that agent failed to do his bidding or became faithless to his trust? Oh, yes; he recognizes that the private individual has the right to recall a faithless agent or an incompetent one or one who takes the bit in his mouth and refuses to obey; but we are demagogues if we differ with him and say that the people ought to have the same right of control over their agents and representatives. It is a rut that the gentleman is in. He simply has not lifted himself out of it. I admire his fearlessness in the bold, blunt utterances that he makes, but he has not the spirit of the democracy that believes in the people while he utters these sentences of denunciation and distrust of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

One gentleman, a Democrat, Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, said he had heard the judiciary as a whole denounced wildly by demagogues. Now, I never heard such a thing, and I think if the gentleman will revise his memory he probably never heard anybody denounce the whole judiciary. He may have heard somebody make some rather broad charges, and I want to say that about the broadest and gravest criticisms I have ever read came, I think, from Thomas Jefferson, whose disciples we profess to be and are to some extent.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOWARD). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. If I catch the gentleman's position, it is that it is no more dangerous to vacate a judicial office by popular election than it is to fill it by popular election.

Mr. HARDY. No; not a bit. It is the same principle. One may be more practicable, but the principle is the same. If a man is elected to office for two years, and he is defeated at the end of that time when he runs for reelection, it is the same principle as if you defeat him before the end of the two years.

But my friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE] took occasion to say that the judiciary must be free to hold the mob straight, that the judiciary must be free to hold the legislative branch of the Government straight, that the judiciary must be free and independent to hold the executive straight and prevent it oppressing the people. In God's name, I ask him, if the judiciary usurps, if the judiciary oppresses or is faithless, who, if the people are powerless, will hold the judge straight? All during the Sixtieth Congress Democrats were trying to restrain the Federal judiciary and prevent its oppressive practices, its abuses of power. Doubtless the gentleman thinks we were wrong. Mr. Jefferson feared the Federal judiciary, and to some extent the judiciary generally. He wrote:

* * * As, for the safety of society, we commit honest maniacs to bedlam, so judges should be withdrawn from their bench whose erroneous biases are leading us to dissolution. It may, indeed, injure them in fame or in fortune, but it saves the Republic, which is the first and supreme law.

In view of the discussion here it seems as if with prophetic eye, looking down the coming of a hundred years, Jefferson saw the very conditions that arise to-day, and his utterance of a hundred years ago is paralleled by the warnings of a member of the Supreme Court to-day, which I will read later.

Again, he wrote:

One single object, if your provision [in the Louisiana Code] attains it, will entitle you to the endless gratitude of society—that of restraining judges from usurping legislation. And with no body of men is this restraint more wanting than with the judges of what is commonly called our General Government. (To Edward Livingston, vii, 403.)

And, again:

We already see the power installed for life, responsible to no authority—for impeachment is not even a scarecrow—advancing with a noiseless and steady pace to the great object of consolidation. * * * That there should be public functionaries independent of the nation whatever may be their demerit, is a solecism in a republic of the first order of absurdity and inconsistency. (To Wm. T. Barry, vii, 256.)

Judiciary curbing: Impeachment, therefore, is a bugbear which they fear not at all. But they would be under some awe of the canvass of their conduct, which would be open to both Houses regularly every sixth year. It is a misnomer to call a government republican in which a branch of the supreme power is independent of the nation. (To James A. Pleasants, Ford ed., x, 198.)

Jefferson was progressive. He was leading the way from darkness to light. It was a great thing in his day to have achieved the removal of the judiciary from a life tenure to a six-year term and to recall them every sixth year. But Jefferson died and Federal judges still hold office for life, with no power to recall them. In his autobiography we find him again saying:

* * * There was another amendment [to the Federal Constitution] of which none of us thought at the time [when the Constitution was framed] and in the omission of which lurks the germ that is to destroy this happy combination of national powers in the General Government for matters of national concern, and independent powers in the States, for what concerns the States severally. In England it was a great point gained at the Revolution that the commission of the judges, which had hitherto been during pleasure, should thenceforth be made during good behavior. A judiciary dependent on the will of the King had proved itself the most oppressive of all tools in the hands of that magistrate. Nothing, then, could be more salutary than a change there to the tenure of good behavior, and the question of good behavior left to the vote of a simple majority in the two Houses of Parliament. Before the Revolution we were all good English Whigs, cordial in their free principles and in their jealousies of their Executive Magistrate. These jealousies are very apparent in all our State constitutions and in the General Government. In this instance we have gone even beyond the English caution by requiring a vote of two-thirds in one of the Houses for removing a judge, a vote so impossible where any defense is made before men of ordinary prejudices and passions that our judges are effectually independent of the Nation. But this ought not to be. (Autobiography, i, 80, Ford ed., i, 111.)

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious to get through, but though curtailing my remarks I really have not reached the one particular thing that I desire to discuss.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. HARDY. I would like to have 40 minutes at least.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield 40 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. To continue my quotations from Jefferson:

Sappers and miners: A judiciary independent of an executive or king alone is a good thing, but independence of the will of the nation is a solecism, at least in a republican government. (To Thomas Richie, vii, 192. Ford, ed., x, 170.)

* * * This member of the Government was considered at first as the most harmless and helpless of all its organs, but it has proved that its power of declaring what the law is, ad libitum, by sapping and mining, slyly and without alarm, the foundations of the Constitution, can do what open force would not dare to attempt. (To Edward Livingstone, vii, 404.)

I want to say right here that it must be understood that I do not regard the recall of officers of any kind as any light or trifling thing, but I say that the right of a people to be represented by servants who are faithful to them, and who are the servants of their choice, the right of the initiative and the referendum and the recall, in order to be secure in true and faithful agents, servants, and officers of all kinds, is as inalienable a right existing in every people as the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and it is for them to say what limitations or restrictions they will put upon the exercise of that right.

How they shall recall, whether by elections every two years or by petitions to recall, whether they shall give a Representative a two-year, a four-year, or a six-year term, unless recalled, the method does not affect the principle of it. It is for them to say how and when they will terminate the services of a servant who is unfaithful or does not please them. It may be, as one of Shakespeare's characters says, that the only objection is "his face belikes me not." The faith of our party of our day is to trust the people, and he who to-day refuses to trust the people must learn that the moss is on his back and that he belongs to a dead and gone generation. [Applause.] Gentlemen, a recall is no stain, unless the cause of the recall be a stain, but impeachment blackens the character of the man impeached for all time. I have seen jury trials where, were I on the panel, I would render the Scotch verdict of "guilty, but not proven," and I would acquit the defendant, but would not keep him in my employ. And so we have cases where you can not properly impeach, where you can not get the evidence to impeach, where through the courts full inquiry is blocked, where the servant is so powerful he can prevent full investigation; in such case must we keep the servant?

Mr. Chairman, this is no new doctrine. It is an old maxim, "Qui facit per alium, facit per se." The doctrine of some gentlemen here is that you may do things through others, but you can not do them yourself; that the principal is not to act through his agent, but can only act as his agent wills, a strange perversion of the doctrine of principal and agent, of master and servant. The agent directs the principal; the servant rules the master.

I have many further quotations from Jefferson, all bearing out the views I have expressed, but I omit them, and ask to read some sentences from the opinion of Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court, just delivered by him in the Standard Oil case.

In that opinion Justice Harlan, among other things, says:

In the now not a very short life that I have passed in this capital and the public service of the country, the most alarming tendency of this day, in my judgment, so far as the safety and integrity of our institutions are concerned, is the tendency to judicial legislation, so that, when men having vast interests are concerned, and they can not get the lawmaking power of the country which controls it to pass the legislation they desire, the next thing they do is to raise the question in some case, to get the court to so construe the Constitution or the statutes as to mean what they want it to mean. That has not been our practice.

* * * * * * *

The court, in the opinion of this case, says that this act of Congress means and embraces only unreasonable restraint of trade in flat contradiction to what this court has said 15 years ago that Congress did not intend.

* * * * * * *

Practically the decision to-day—I do not mean the judgment—but parts of the opinion, are to the effect, practically, that the courts may, by mere judicial construction, amend the Constitution of the United States or an act of Congress. That, it strikes me, is mischievous; and that is the part of the opinion that I especially object to.

Mr. Chairman and fellow Members, I have listened with some anxiety to see if any man who objected to Arizona's exercise of the right of recall had any criticism to make of the constitution of New Mexico. It is a rather strange coincidence, but if I remember aright, not a man who is denouncing Arizona's constitution has had a word of criticism of that remarkable instrument submitted to us and known as the New Mexico constitution. And yet there was a mountain of testimony before us and almost a confession, that it was made by corporations, of corporations, and for corporations. And it was so wonderfully made that the chairman of the convention that framed it is reported to have said when he ceased from his labors that they had fixed it so that it could not be altered in 99 years.

Strangely, no man on that side, and no man on our side, who criticizes Arizona has yet had a word of criticism for that constitution.

In the beginning I said something of Judge A. B. Fall, the man who was the genius of the New Mexico constitution. I should, perhaps, read from our hearings, but I will not have time to do so. I want to tell you that the testimony before us shows that he was a Democrat up to 1898, that then he changed his affiliations, that he was elected, I believe, from a Democratic county, to that constitutional convention as a bipartisan. It shows, without controversy, that he went there pledged to the doctrine of initiative and referendum. It shows that that convention had a majority of its representatives pledged to the doctrine of initiative and referendum—52 out of the 78 or 79, I believe. It shows that in that convention he was one of the prime movers, going from committee to committee, working all day and far into the night, counseling and advising. And when confronted with the charge that he had caused the elimination of the initiative and referendum feature from the constitution his reply was, "You do me too much honor." The good things of that constitution were like Burns's Pleasures:

> But pleasures are like poppies spread:
> You seize the flow'r, its bloom is shed;
> Or like the snow falls in the river,
> A moment white—then melts forever.

It was so with the initiative and referendum. Not only is the good lacking and the evil abounding, as we think, in this constitution, but those who wish it to remain as it stands declared they had made it hard to amend purposely.

Now, I want to call your attention to another fact showing corporation earmarks, to my mind. When the first hearings were had before our committee it seemed to us as if the pro and con side, the for and against that constitution, were about to agree on terms acceptable to all; that those favoring that constitution would agree that the people of New Mexico might be permitted to vote again upon that section authorizing amendments; and, if they chose, to adopt a section making amendments less difficult. That was all the other side insisted on.

For a good while our hearings went along on that idea, that maybe the opposing parties could agree; and the great genius of that constitution, Judge Fall, by his language and expressions before us seemed ready to agree. Gov. Curry, of that Territory, was before us, and declared the constitution was not what he wanted; that it had objectionable features; that he would change it if it were left to him. But when we got down to the point and finally sought an agreement some overshadowing impulse or feeling or influence seemed to pervade those who were there for the constitution, and Fall, Curry, and others wanted it as it is, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," although Mr. Fall himself had denounced certain features of it; and they wanted to cling to the provision that rendered it impossible of amendment.

Now, without reading them, I want to give you the substance of the two provisions that make this constitution the instrument of corrupt influences in New Mexico. The first is the provision with reference to the regulation and control of railroads, article 11, section 7. This provision absolutely takes away from the Legislature of New Mexico all power to do anything to control, to limit, or to restrain the railroads of that Territory. The constitution vests all lawmaking power in the legislature, except as "herein limited," and then by article 11, section 7, it creates a commission and vests absolutely in that commission these powers:

SEC. 7. The commission shall have power and be charged with the duty of fixing, determining, supervising, regulating, and controlling all charges and rates of railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping-car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers within the State; to require railway companies to provide and maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express; and to provide and maintain necessary crossings, culverts, and sidings upon and alongside of their roadbeds whenever, in the judgment of the commission, the public interests demand and as may be reasonable and just. The commission shall also have power and be charged with the duty to make and enforce reasonable and just rules requiring the supplying of cars and equipment for the use of shippers and passengers, and to require all intrastate railways, transportation companies, or common carriers to provide such reasonable safety appliances in connection with all equipment as may be necessary and proper for the safety of its employees and the public and as are now or may be required by the Federal laws, rules, and regulations governing interstate commerce. The commission shall have power to change or alter such rates, to change, alter, or amend its orders, rules, regulations, or determinations, and to enforce the same in the manner prescribed herein: Provided, That in the matter of fixing rates of telephone and telegraph companies due consideration shall be given to the earnings, investment, and expenditure as a whole within the State. The commission shall have power to subpœna witnesses and enforce their attendance before the commission, through any district court or the supreme court of the State, and through such court to punish for contempt; and it shall have power, upon a hearing, to determine and decide any question given to it herein, and in case of failure or refusal of any person, company, or corporation to comply with any order within the time limit therein, unless an order of removal shall have been taken from such order by the company or corporation to the supreme court of this State, it shall immediately become the duty of the commission to remove such order, with the evidence adduced upon the hearing, with the documents in the case, to the supreme court of this State. Any company, corporation, or common carrier which does not comply with the order of the commission within the time limited therefor may file with the commission a petition to remove such cause to the supreme court, and in the event of such removal by the company, corporation, or common carrier, or other party to such hearing, the supreme court may, upon application, in its direction or of its own motion, require or authorize additional evidence to be taken in such cause; but in the event of removal by the commission, upon failure of the company, corporation, or common carrier, no additional evidence shall be allowed. The supreme court, for the consideration of such causes arising thereunder, shall be in session at all times and shall give precedence to such causes. Any party to such hearing before the commission shall have the same right to remove the order entered therein to the supreme court of the State, as given under the provisions hereof to the company or corporations against which such order is directed.

By this section railway companies need not appeal (but other parties must) if they would set aside the acts of the commission.

Having vested the commission with this power, the legislature is shorn——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. These railroad commissioners, as you call them, are selected how? Are they elected by the people?

Mr. HARDY. They are elected by the people for six years.

Mr. BARTLETT. And are they given power to grant charters and say what kind of bonds and stocks shall be issued by railroad corporations?

Mr. HARDY. I confess I have not investigated that.

Mr. BARTLETT. The granting of charters to railroads is reserved to the legislature, is it?

Mr. HARDY. I think that would possibly still be in the legislature, although I am not sure about that. But let us grant that that is so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think it a very safe thing to grant to a subordinate body in the State the power to grant a charter, where those to whom it is granted will exercise the power of eminent domain, unless the State reserves to itself the right to grant charters as other States do, where the party that receives the charter exercises the right of eminent domain?

Mr. HARDY. I think as the gentleman does, and I am willing to go a good deal further. I believe that the legislature of a State which undertakes to exercise power over great interests should retain that power to itself, and the giving of that power to another body means, in my judgment, that some secret influence is back of the granting of that power to another body in the constitution of that Territory. I do not believe that any State should be bound by its constitution so that it can not by its legislature control any creature made by itself, living and inhabiting within its borders. But that is what this constitution does.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman understands that there is a wide distinction with reference to power and policy as between banking corporations and other corporations which could not exercise the power of condemnation and eminent domain and railroad corporations which could exercise those powers, if those powers were granted; and it occurs to me that it is rather mingling the powers, or surrendering legislative power, when any subordinate branch of the State government is authorized to grant charters where the right of eminent domain is given to the corporation so chartered.

Mr. HARDY. I think I will go along on that line, but not exactly in those terms. A republic might divide its lawmaking power. I think it is a question of policy whether the Government will clothe an independent body with legislative and executive powers. But it would be contrary to the genius of our Government to make one body embrace all those powers.

Judge Fall, answering a question by myself, said that it was the purpose of this constitution to take away all this power enumerated in section 7 of article 11—take it away from the legislature and bar the legislature from ever exercising it until that constitution was amended.

He said their reason for doing it was that the railroads had corrupted their Territorial legislatures; and for fear they would corrupt them again, they wanted to put these powers into the hands of an incorruptible commission. Wonderful reasoning, it seemed to me. Later he let it out that in these stirring days, these piping times of peace, agitation was shaking that country, corruption was being driven from its stronghold, and it looked to me a little bit as though the legislature was being awakened by the people, and it was time for the railroads to get out of the house where they had been taken care of before, to find some new quarters where they might be protected. So they, by this constitution, provide double protection. They take these powers away from the legislature and nominally put them in the commission; but when you read that section fully, you find they have this strangest of all features, that when the commission makes a ruling, if the railroad does not like the ruling it can at once file a petition and carry it up to the supreme court of the State. If they do that, they can then introduce more testimony and have a rehearing, and take their time for the rehearing; but that is not all.

The railroads have the right of appeal, but they are not required to appeal. They may simply ignore the ruling of the commission. No injunction is necessary. All they have to do is just to ignore what the commission has done, and then, whenever the commission finds out they have ignored it, and it may be weeks or months before they find it out, the commission then must subserviently bundle up the papers and send them to the supreme court; and then the supreme court in the course of time takes hold of the case and hears it on the record and says that it either does or does not sustain the commission. How long this may be after the ruling is made by the commission, who can tell?

Mr. SISSON. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman in the course of his argument——

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. SISSON. Section 6, under article 11, gives this commission, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislature, the power to issue all charters for domestic corporations, and amendments or extensions thereof, and to license foreign corporations to do business in the State, to which shall be carried out all the provisions of this constitution relative to corporations and laws made in pursuance thereof, not only with reference to railroads, but all corporations.

Mr. HARDY. I thank the gentleman very much for that interruption, and I want to preface an apology by saying that I have become so obsessed with the iniquity of section 7 of that article that I had neglected all the rest, for in that was the rotten core of the whole proposition of this constitution.

Section 7, following section 6, is the damnable iniquity of the whole thing. The legislature is stripped of all power. The legislature becomes an absolutely useless branch of the government as to the management of these great bodies corporate. Then this corporation commission is clothed apparently with the power to do these things, and each commissioner is given a six year's term of office. This is the first refuge of the railroads, express companies, and so forth. In addition to that, when the commission acts, if the railroads see proper to obey, all well and good. If they are not then satisfied with the evidence they have introduced, if they want to introduce more evidence they will appeal to the supreme court; but if the case stands on the record as they want it, they just ignore the order of the commission, and in the course of time it goes before the court. The court is the second refuge of the railroads. The judges of this court are elected for eight years.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman, Does the constitution provide for the election of all these commissioners at one time for six years, or do they go out one at a time?

Mr. HARDY. At first they are all elected, and then they draw for the longer and shorter terms—that is, terms of two, four, and six years—and after that every two years one man is elected and one goes out. Now, the point is this: You get your commission order, and it goes before the supreme court, and the supreme court hears evidence, or not, as the case may be, and then the court either confirms or annuls the action of the commission. Everything comes before that court, and that court is the commission at last, and not the three commissioners themselves. The office of the commission seems to be merely that of an outpost of defense for the corporation. The court is their last shelter. Neither of these bodies can at any time have more than one member who is fresh from the people, and both these bodies must act affirmatively against the railroads before relief is even initiated.

Not only so, but this section 7 takes the judicial branch of the government and inserts it into the legislative branch and concentrates all lawmaking and judicial power as to railroads in the supreme court. Doubtless that court may be composed of honorable men, but courts, it has been declared, are always reaching out for more power. This constitution places in the hands of the court absolute control, for weal or woe, of the most stupendous interests and enterprises in that State. The State's governor may chafe, her legislature may fret, her people may curse, but the court sits steady; her power is single and supreme. Is such a situation consonant with the genius or spirit of our day and generation? No.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I will.

Mr. JACKSON. I do not interrupt the gentleman with any desire to interfere in his speech, for I am in sympathy with the report of the committee. But I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the very reason for giving the supreme court this power was to prevent the Federal courts from interfering with the regulations by the local power, and if that is not approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prentice against the Atlantic Seaboard?

Mr. HARDY. I am glad the gentleman interrupted me, because it leads me to say something that I did not think of. That is the reason they have given for this clause in the constitution. They say it would prevent your commission from being enjoined. It is true this commission can not be enjoined, because it never does anything to be enjoined. The difference between this commission and the commission in other States is that in other States the orders of the commission are subject to be killed by injunction, but the orders of this commission are not subject to be killled, for they are born dead. [Laughter.]

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman does not refer to the orders of the supreme court being dead?

Mr. HARDY. No; I was coming to that. I do not doubt for one minute when the supreme court begin to issue their orders the Federal courts will hold, when it comes to orders, that they are not judicial, and they will enjoin the execution of these orders on the ground that these acts and orders of the court are legislative and executive rather than judicial, and the same grounds for injunction will lie, as may lie, in the case of orders of any other State commission.

Mr. JACKSON. No doubt about that.

Mr. HARDY. Then what steps have these gentlemen made toward obviating the delay; have they made a step in advance obviating delay? Have they not all of the means of delay left and this—that is, the delay in getting from the commission to the supreme court—in addition?

Mr. JACKSON. I think not; but that is only my opinion.

Mr. HARDY. I know that the gentleman is disposed to look at this in the light of reason. If he will give it careful attention he will come to the conclusion that I am right—that this is only a greater delay added to a great delay.

Now, I want to say that it was urged by members in the convention that there should be submitted to the people along with the constitution an independent proposition, to become a part of the constitution, that would give the legislature the right at a later date to increase the powers of that commission and alter or affect the rules of the commission. Some of the delegates thought the commission as made would be of no value to the people. But the framers of the constitution, who had some purpose in mind too big to allow it to be interfered with, said "No; we will not submit with the constitution a proposition to clothe the legislature with the power of further enlarging the sphere of the commission. No; we want it just like it is; no other way."

Now, that brings me to the closing feature of what I shall have to say. The second provision that makes this constitution the instrument of the corrupt influences in New Mexico is article 19. That article provides for amendment of this constitution. The framers of this constitution having fastened their chains and double-locked them, with the key thrown away, some of these people bound in chains came to a Democratic committee and said, "Give us a chance to find the key." They said, "Look at this constitution. Suppose all that we say is not true, why, then, what harm is done by giving us the power to amend it? On the other hand, suppose all we say is true, what then? If these gentlemen represented by Judge Fall are right, and this constitution works right, we will not want to amend it, but if we find that the fetters are grinding into the flesh and grinding the life out of the body politic, and the corporations are enthroned in power, let us, for God's sake, have a way to change it." [Applause.]

What man on that side or this will tell the people that you shall not have a right to amend your fundamental law? If corporations have crept in and fixed and framed their constitution, will you not give them a chance to amend it? This is all that Fergusson, McGill, and others, representing the Democrats and many Republicans in that Territory, have asked. For doing this they have been held up to public obloquy and charged with attempting to delay the admission of New Mexico by the public press of New Mexico; I had almost said the venal press of that Territory. I do not say it is a venal press, though it seems hard to believe it an honest press when they make such charges in the face of the fact that every opponent of the New Mexico constitution who came before us from that Territory declared, always, his opposition to any delay of its admission under any condition, and urged us to do nothing that could delay admission, but to do all we could for the relief of the people that could be done without delaying their statehood.

A fair sample of New Mexico press literature is the following. After charging that Fergusson and others were trying to delay statehood, one paper says:

> The statement, made by whomsoever, that the constitution is not amendable by the people is a bald, glaring, transparent falsehood. The gentlemen who are making this statement know it to be a falsehood, which is refuted by the wording of the constitution so plainly that a schoolboy can see it. The spectacle of four alleged Democrats who have been repudiated by the rank and file of the New Mexico Democracy assuming to decide as to the possibility of early admission, and assuming to say what changes shall be made in a constitution ratified by the whole people, is one that has disgusted people of all parties all over New Mexico.

And this paper says that in the face of the facts that show that this constitution is almost impossible of amendment as it stands now. Speaking in broad terms, they have a constitution that requires two-thirds of the members elected to each house to vote for the submission of an amendment, and then it requires that a majority of all of the votes cast on that amendment shall be cast for it in the whole State. That is well enough. But then it requires that that majority shall be equal to at least 40 per cent of the whole vote in the whole State cast on all questions at that election. Now, we know that constitutional amendments are not understood by everybody, are not of interest to everybody, and that frequently men not knowing or caring will vote neither for nor against a proposed amendment. A vote on a constitutional amendment, unless it is one that stirs the whole country, rarely ever amounts to over 60 per cent of the total vote. If that be the standard that will prevail in such elections, it will require two-thirds of the votes cast on the amendment—two-thirds of 60 being 40—in order to get 40 per cent of the total vote to pass it. Ah, that is bad enough, but that is no worse than in most of the States. I want to admit that most constitutions are too hard to amend. I want to admit that the idea of stability has carried weight—and I am not criticizing the men who sometimes want to go slow—but the iniquity of this amendment provision comes after. Not only does it require 40 per cent of all the votes cast at the election in the entire State, but it requires that 40 per cent of the vote cast must be in favor of the amendment in at least 50 per cent of all the counties in that State. New Mexico is like other States and has large and small counties. If you can persuade a lot of little counties to ignore an amendment submitted to the people at large, or if in the remoteness of their regions they have not been taught what the amendment involved, and they ignore it—if you can get 50 per cent of those little counties to fail to cast 40 per cent of their total vote for the amendment, either by getting them to vote against it or not vote at all on it, your amendment is defeated. Four-fifths of the popular vote in the State might be for the amendment and still the amendment fail.

My countrymen, the advocates of that constitution ransacked the pages of constitutional literature to find a constitution like it, and could find nowhere under the ægis of the American flag a sovereign State which has such a provision. But our friends who are afraid of the people, even those on this side of the aisle, never criticize that at all. The only analogy found, or the only illustration of a somewhat equivalent difficulty to amend that was found, in all of the annals of constitutional history brought before our committee was the Constitution of the United States, framed under the conditions and with the views that I have attempted to outline to this body. But here in the light of the beginning of the twentieth century, when science is advancing, when art is moving, when the science of government is marching, when human liberty is lighting the torch of freedom everywhere in all the world, we find a constitution framed to put shackles upon the body of a young and growing giant, and they tell us in boastfulness that 99 years will be required to break the shackles; that it might possibly be done sooner, but that it would take a revolution to do it. Sir, this constitution is framed not so much in the interest of any party as it is in the interest of great corporations.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose is ended. I want to ask before I close why any man should object, and I ask this in all seriousness—why any man on that side should object to allowing the people of New Mexico a free opportunity, unmenaced by threats, uninfluenced by fears, unbiased by interests, why he should object to letting them vote deliberately and solely upon the question of whether they would make their constitution more easy of amendment? Yea, Judge Fall and all the rest denounce some of the features of that constitution as an outrage and an indignity upon part of their people, but when it comes to giving them the opportunity freely to express their will as to whether they would enable themselves to amend their constitution or not they fall back, and through some invisible power somewhere they say, "No; we do not want to touch the sacred thing." [Applause on Democratic side.]

I ask you if any man on that side can give a reason for not being willing to let these people, unbiased, uninfluenced, untrammeled, unmenaced, say whether they want the privilege of amendment? When they voted on this constitution they were compelled to vote for it or lose statehood. They would have voted for almost anything to obtain statehood.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman talks as if he were going to close on this question, and I would like to have him explain to the House what he thinks of section 2, the 25-year limitation in reference to calling a constitutional convention.

Does not this constitution for 25 years practically deprive the people of the right of calling a constitutional convention?

Mr. HARDY. It is the corporation section that the framers of this constitution wish to guard, to keep; and for that reason it provides that a three-fourths vote of each house before 25 years and a two-thirds vote of each house after that, be required in each legislature to call a convention. They could take any number of little counties and prevent that; but, better still, it is clearly shown that about four counties in the State, where the corporations are strongest, have the absolute power under the apportionment made to control more than a third of the senate. And that apportionment must remain till some means is found to amend this constitution. So with your corporate power controlling those counties there is no possibility of a constitutional convention. They have done this in their apportionment by first giving each of these corporation counties a senator, and then tacking onto it another county and giving it a second senator, and then tacking onto it a third county and giving it a third senator. Judge Fall himself, in effect, says that New Mexico has been practically corporation ridden and corporation debauched heretofore. He said the legislature has been so debauched that they wanted to take power away from it. With that kind of a statement, with the grasping of the corporations, and with three or four counties given power to control, you never can get a convention under that constitution.

Mr. SISSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this, in section 2, article 19: It provides that after this call for a constitutional convention shall be passed by the legislature, it is then submitted to the people, and then a majority of the people in at least 50 per cent of the counties is required. Now, under that provision, would it not be possible for 75, yea, in an extreme case, 90 per cent of the people to demand a constitutional convention and yet not be able to get a majority of the counties, because the small counties might be the counties that would be opposed to it?

Mr. HARDY. That is exactly the argument I have been attempting to make, that this constitution is without a parallel in history. That it could be prevented from being amended, although 90 per cent of the whole people might desire it, and these conditions were put there with the purpose that it should not be amended, and it was brutally stated that it was almost impossible to amend it.

Now, I will close by asking any lover of freedom, and there are some on the other side of the aisle, if he believes it wrong to let those people, unmenaced, untrammeled, uninfluenced, unthreatened, vote freely on the proposition as to whether they might not more easily amend their constitution? That is what the majority report asks you to do, and I ask you to vote on that proposition only. There may be some here who do not wish these people to be free to strike the chains of corporation dominion from their wrists. To such an one I make no appeal. "Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone." [Loud applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, last year in the consideration of the judiciary title revision bill there came incidentally before the House the question of the power of Congress to require a State to insert an inviolable provision in its constitution as to the location of the capital of Oklahoma for a period of years, which brings, in a way, for the consideration of the public, the question as to the power of Congress in the admission of new States into the Union, and it is my purpose this morning, somewhat apart from the discussion which has so far taken place in the House as to the admission of New Mexico and Arizona, to present a legal argument on the subject of the power of Congress in regard to the admission of States.

The only provision of the Federal Constitution respecting this is section 3 of Article IV:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

There is no provision as to the mode in which, or the terms or conditions upon which, Congress is to exercise this power.

The only provision of the Constitution which has reference to the domestic institutions of the States is section 4 of Article IV:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion and, on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence.

There are numerous provisions imposing limitations upon the powers of the States.

Section 10 of Article I provides:

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

Sections 1 and 2 of Article IV may also be said to impose limitations upon the powers of the States, inasmuch as what they require of the States may not be denied by them. They are:

SECTION 1. Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

SEC. 2. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

Articles IX and X of the amendments, as they are limitations upon the Federal power, necessarily affect the power of the States. They are:

ARTICLE IX.

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE X.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Articles XIII, XIV, and XV of the amendments all contain limitations upon the powers of the States. They are:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridge, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a Member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

ARTICLE XV.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

In addition to the express limitations upon the powers of the States are those necessarily implied by and resulting from the grant of powers to the General Government.

The Constitution makes no distinction in terms between the original States of the Union and those subsequently admitted. Neither does it in terms provide that new States shall be admitted upon an equal footing with the old. The question was the subject of much consideration in the Federal Convention, and it is a great question of present interest, as to whether Congress has the power, in the admission of new States, to make a distinction between the powers which can be exercised by the new State admitted and the powers which may be exercised by the original States. The question of the admission of new States was one of much consideration, as I said, in the Federal Constitutional Convention.

The Virginia plan, presented by Mr. Randolph, provided in the tenth resolution as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether from a voluntary junction of government and territory or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the National Legislature less than the whole (p. 128).

This quotation and all following are from Elliot's Debates, volume 5, edition of 1845.

Pinckney's plan provided in Article XIV (p. 132):

The Legislature shall have power to admit new States into the Union on the same terms with the original States, provided that two-thirds of the Members present in both Houses agree.

Randolph's general proposition, set out above, was agreed to (pp. 156 and 157).

On June 13, 1787, the committee reported a general plan of government, including Randolph's proposition as to new States (p. 190).

The effect of the admission of new States was considered.

Gouverneur Morris thought—the rule of representation ought to be so fixed as to secure to the Atlantic States a prevalence in the national councils.

That almost makes us smile to-day.

Col. Mason thought that if new States were—made a part of the Union, they ought to be subject to no unfavorable discriminations.

Mr. Randolph concurred with this.

It was proposed at one time to apportion representation among the States "upon the principles of their wealth and number of inhabitants." This was, however, not adopted.

Madison "was clear and firm in opinion that no unfavorable distinctions were admissible, either in point of justice or policy" with regard to the Western States.

Gerry "thought it necessary to limit the number of new States to be admitted into the Union in such a manner that they should never be able to outnumber the Atlantic States," and moved—that, in order to secure the liberties of the States already confederated, the number of Representatives in the first branch, of the States which shall hereafter be established, shall never exceed in number the Representatives from such of the States as shall accede to this confederation.

King seconded this. Sherman opposed. Gerry's motion was lost.

August 6 Rutledge presented the report of the committee, which contained Article XVII:

New States lawfully constituted or established within the limits of the United States may be admitted by the legislature into this Government; but to such admission the consent of two-thirds of the Members present in each House shall be necessary. If a new State shall arise within the limits of any of the present States, the consent of the legislatures of such States shall be also necessary to its admission. If the admission be consented to, the new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States. But the legislature may make conditions with the new States concerning the public debt which shall be then subsisting.

When this article came up for consideration Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out:

If the admission be consented to, the new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States. But the Legislature may make conditions with the new States concerning the public debt which shall be then subsisting.

Madison, Mason, and Sherman opposed the motion. Langdon favored it. Williamson was for leaving Congress free. Motion carried. Nine States, aye; Maryland and Virginia, no.

Morris moved as substitute for Article XVII that—

New States may be admitted by the Legislature into the Union; but no new States shall be erected within the limits of any of the present States without the consent of the legislature of such State as well as of the General Legislature.

This was agreed to down to the word "Union"; that is:

New States may be admitted by the Legislature into the Union.

That was unanimously agreed to, and Morris's motion to substitute was agreed to.

Various amendments were offered and considerable discussion was had, and Morris's substitute as amended was adopted, 8 to 3. This was:

New States may be admitted by the Legislature into the Union; but no new State shall be hereafter formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any of the present States without the consent of the legislature of such State as well as of the General Legislature (p. 496).

Dickinson moved, and it was agreed, to add:

Nor shall any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts thereof, without the consent of the legislature of such States as well as of the Legislature of the United States.

These two provisions taken together, it will be seen, are in effect the same as section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution. The verbal changes were made by the committee of style, which, through Dr. Johnson, reported on September 12 the Constitution in its present form, saving some immaterial alterations.

That gives the history of the provision in the convention as adopted, and I come now to discuss the practice which Congress has exercised in admitting new States under this provision of the Constitution.

All of the enabling acts and resolutions admitting States to the Union in some form have declared the status of the State when admitted.

Kentucky and Vermont were each—received and admitted into this Union as a new and entire member of the United States of America.

Tennessee, Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Maine, Missouri, Michigan, Arkansas, Texas, Wisconsin, California, Minnesota, Kansas, West Virginia, Nevada, Idaho, and Wyoming were each "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

Ohio was "admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

Florida, Iowa, Nebraska, and Colorado were each "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

Oregon was "received into the Union on an equal footing with the other States in all respects whatever."

North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, Utah, and Oklahoma were admitted "on an equal footing with the original States."

CONDITIONS IMPOSED.

The enabling act for Ohio provided that the constitution should be republican in form and not repugnant to the ordinance of 1787. There was also a grant of lands to the State on certain conditions.

It was required also of Indiana and Illinois that their constitutions should be in conformity with the ordinance of 1787.

As to Louisiana, the constitution must be republican, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, and secure to the citizen the trial by jury in all criminal cases and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, conformably to the Constitution of the United States; and after admission its laws, records, and legislative and judicial proceedings must be in English; no discrimination in taxation of lands between resident and nonresident citizens; and the Mississippi River and navigable waters leading into it and into the Gulf of Mexico to be common highways and forever free.

Mississippi must have a republican form of government; freedom of navigable waters leading into the Mississippi, and so forth, and no discrimination between resident and nonresident citizens in taxation of lands.

Alabama is substantially the same as Mississippi.

Missouri was admitted on the fundamental condition that a provision of her constitution which made it the duty of the legislature—to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in the State under any pretext whatever * * * shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

The legislature of the State was required to give assent to this condition by solemn act, and this was done.

The enabling act itself required that the government should be republican in form and not repugnant to the Federal Constitution. The State must not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States, must not tax lands of the United States, nor discriminate in taxation of lands between resident and nonresident proprietors.

Arkansas: No interference with primary disposal of public lands, and lands of the United States not to be taxed.

The enabling act for Texas provided that the State should consent to have questions of boundaries determined by the United States with other Governments; that its constitution should be laid before Congress for final action; the fortifications should be conceded to the United States; that new States might be created with the consent of Texas not exceeding four in number, with or without slavery, south of 36° 30′ north latitude; and that in States formed out of territory north of Missouri compromise there should be no slavery.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield as to the boundary of Texas?

Mr. MANN. No; not on the boundary of Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I just want to say that there was good reason for that.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It brought on the Mexican War.

Mr. MANN. Every student of history is aware of that fact.

The conditions imposed upon Iowa were made in consideration of land granted, and provided for noninterference by the State with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States; for regulations by Congress for securing the title in such soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; for the nontaxation of United States property; for the nontaxation of nonresident proprietors at a higher rate than resident proprietors; for the nontaxation, for a limited period of time, of certain bounty land granted for military services.

The enabling act for Wisconsin provided for the freedom of navigable waters leading into the Mississippi from toll. It also provided for the giving of land to Wisconsin upon the condition that it should never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, and so forth, and not to tax nonresident proprietors at a higher rate than resident proprietors.

The act admitting California declared the State admitted into the Union upon express condition of noninterference with the primary disposal of the public lands, and so forth, and the nontaxation of nonresident proprietors at a higher rate than resident proprietors, and for the freedom of navigable waters within the State.

The Minnesota act contained provisions for the grant of land by the United States (quite common in the Western States) upon the usual conditions as to primary disposal of the soil, and so forth, and the nontaxation of nonresident proprietors at a higher rate than resident proprietors. On May 11, 1858 (11 Stat., 285), Congress declared Minnesota admitted into the Union.

The Oregon act of admission provided that all navigable waters of the State should be free from toll. It also provided for the grant of land to Oregon upon the usual conditions.

The Kansas act of admission provided that nothing contained in the Constitution should be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to Indians so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians.

The West Virginia act provided for its admission by proclamation when it should have amended its constitution, as its convention had expressed a desire to do, so as to limit the existence of slavery therein. The constitution was so amended and the State admitted.

The enabling acts for Nevada, Colorado, and Nebraska, all passed in 1864, were much the same. They provided for a constitution which was republican, and so forth, which should prohibit slavery and secure religious liberty. There were the usual provisions concerning public lands and the taxation of lands. Each act provided as to the convention elected to frame the constitution for the State—

That the members of the convention, thus elected, shall meet at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday in July next, and, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States. Whereupon the said convention shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory.

The two Dakotas, Montana, and Washington were all four admitted by the same act. It provided for constitutions republican in form; for "no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color * * *"; for an irrevocable ordinance as to religious freedom; as to the nontaxation of Indian lands except where the Indian has severed his tribal relations; for the assumption of certain debts; for the establishment and maintenance of systems of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of such States and free from sectarian control. It provided that the States would be declared admitted by proclamation when they had complied with the enabling act.

In Idaho no conditions except as to the use and disposal of lands granted to the State.

The act admitting Wyoming contained no conditions except some like those of Idaho.

The act for Utah provided that the convention should declare in behalf of the people of the proposed State "that they adopt the Constitution of the United States." It also provided that the State should be republican in form; make no distinction between civil and political rights on account of race or color; not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States nor the principles of the Declaration of Independence; that there shall be perfect religious toleration; and that polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited.

The enabling act for Oklahoma provided that nothing contained in the constitution should be construed to limit or impair the rights of persons or property pertaining to the Indians of said Territory; that the convention shall declare that it adopts the Constitution of the the United States; that the constitution shall be republican in form, make no distinction between civil or political rights on account of race or color, not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence; that there be perfect religious toleration; that there shall be no sale, barter, giving away of liquor, and so forth, within those parts of the State now known as the Indian Territory, and so forth, for 21 years from the date of the admission of the State into the Union, and thereafter until the constitution of the State shall be amended; that provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, open to all the children of the State, free from sectarian control, provided this shall not be construed to prevent the establishment and maintenance of separate schools for white and colored children; that the State shall never enact any law restricting the rights of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; that the capital of the State shall be located at Guthrie until 1913.

The enabling act providing for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona contains various provisions requiring the insertion in the constitutions of various propositions. Among others, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; and that polygamous or plural marriages, or polygamous cohabitation, and the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians, and the introduction of liquors into Indian country are forever prohibited; that the lands and other property belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands and other property belonging to residents thereof; and various other provisions, including that provisions shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control, and that said schools shall always be conducted in English; that said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, speak, and understand the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers and members of the State legislature; that the capital of said State shall, until changed by the electors voting at an election provided for by the legislature of said State for that purpose, be at the city of Phoenix, but no election shall be called or provided for prior to the 31st day of December, 1925.

All of which ordinance described in this section shall, by proper reference, be made a part of any constitution that shall be formed hereunder, in such terms as shall positively preclude the making by any future constitutional amendment of any change or abrogation of the said ordinance in whole or in part without the consent of Congress.

It will be seen that early in the history of the Government Congress prescribed certain conditions to be inserted in the constitutions of the proposed States before those States could be admitted into the Union. And the question arises, first, what power Congress has over the admission of a State before it is admitted; second, what power it has over the constitution of a State after the State is admitted.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman found any place in any of the States that have been admitted where the constitution has not been approved by the President?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes. The constitution of the State of California was not approved by the President.

Mr. RAKER. It was admitted without the approval of the President?

Mr. MANN. Yes. I think this is the first enabling act that ever required approval either by the President or by Congress, except the one I quoted a while ago. And I may say to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who was not in the last House, I think no one believes the sum of all wisdom is included in the enabling act——

Mr. RAKER. That is right.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Which in its present form did not originate in this House; but how far it differs from the form which did originate in this House I do not undertake to say.

I wish to discuss for a short time the decision of the court with reference to what Congress has endeavored to do and has done concerning provisions which Congress has required to be inserted in the constitutions of States as they were admitted into the Union.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS AS TO EFFECT OF RESTRICTIONS OR LIMITATIONS IMPOSED BY CONGRESS UPON A STATE AT THE TIME OF ITS ADMISSION.

In the case of Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan et al (3 How., 212) it was insisted that the provision in the act of Congress of March 2, 1819, admitting Alabama to the Union, and which prescribed—that all navigable waters within the said State shall forever remain public highways, free to the citizens of said State and of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor imposed by said State—limited the power of Alabama over the navigable waters within her limits.

The court held that this provision was nothing more than the exercise of the power which Congress possessed as to all the States, under the Federal Constitution, "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." If the provision went beyond this, the court held that it would be void, saying (p. 223):

When Alabama was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States for the temporary purposes provided for in the deed of cession and the legislative acts connected with it. Nothing remained to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if any express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal rights of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere except in the cases in which it is expressly granted.

In the case of Permoli v. First Municipality (3 How., 589) was involved the validity of an ordinance of the city of New Orleans which forbade the celebration of funerals in the Catholic churches of the municipality.

It was insisted that the ordinance violated the Constitution of the United States, the provision of the enabling act for Louisiana, which prescribed that the constitution of the State should contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, and also the ordinance of 1787. The court said (pp. 609, 610):

The ordinances complained of must violate the Constitution or laws of the United States or some authority exercised under them. If they do not, we have no power by the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act to interfere. The Constitution makes no provision for protecting the citizens of the respective States in their religious liberties. This is left to the State constitutions and laws; nor is there any inhibition imposed by the Constitution of the United States in this respect on the States. We must therefore look beyond the Constitution for the laws that are supposed to be violated and on which our jurisdiction can be founded. These are the following enabling acts of Congress: That of February 20, 1811, authorized the people of the territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government; by section 3 certain restrictions were imposed in the form of instructions to the convention that might frame the constitution, such as that it should be republican, consistent with the Constitution of the United States; that it should contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that it should secure the right of trial by jury in criminal cases and the writ of habeas corpus; that the laws of the State should be published, and legislative and judicial proceedings be written and recorded in the language of the Constitution of the United States. Then follows, by a second proviso, a stipulation reserving to the United States the property in the public lands and their exemption from State taxation, with a declaration that the navigation of the Mississippi and its waters shall be common highways, etc.

By the act of April 8, 1812, Louisiana was admitted according to the mode prescribed by the act of 1811. Congress declared it should be on the conditions and terms contained in the third section of that act, which should be considered, deemed, and taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the State was incorporated in the Union.

All Congress intended was to declare in advance to the people of the territory the fundamental principles their constitution should contain. This was every way proper under the circumstances; the instrument having been duly formed and presented, it was for the National Legislature to judge whether it contained the proper principles, and to accept it if it did or reject it if it did not. Having accepted the constitution and admitted the States "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever," in express terms, by the act of 1812, Congress was concluded from assuming that the instructions contained in the act of 1811 had not been complied with. No fundamental principles could be added by way of amendment, as this would have been making part of the State constitution. If Congress could make it in part, it might, in the form of amendment, make it entire. The conditions and terms referred to in the act of 1812 could only relate to the stipulation contained in the second proviso of the act of 1811 involving rights of property and navigation, and in our opinion were not otherwise intended.

The principal stress of the argument for the plaintiffs in error proceeded on the ordinance of 1787. The act of 1805, chapter 83, having provided that from and after the establishment of the government of the Orleans territory the inhabitants of the same should be entitled to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and advantages secured by said ordinance and then enjoyed by the people of the Mississippi territory. It was also made the frame of government with modifications.

In the ordinance there are terms of compact declared to be thereby established between the original States and the people in the States afterwards to be formed northwest of the Ohio, unalterable, unless by common consent, one of which stipulations is that "no person demeaning himself in a peaceable manner shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory." For this provision is claimed the sanction of an unalterable law of Congress, and it is insisted that the city ordinances above have violated it; and what the force of the ordinance is north of the Ohio we do not pretend to say, as it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case. But as regards the State of Louisiana it had no further force after the adoption of the State constitution than other acts of Congress organizing in part the territorial government of Orleans and standing in connection with the ordinance of 1787. So far as they conferred political rights and secured civil and religious liberties—which are political rights—the laws of Congress were all superseded by the State constitution; nor is any part of them in force unless they were adopted by the constitution of Louisiana as laws of the State. It is not possible to maintain that the United States hold in trust by force of the ordinance for the people of Louisiana all the great elemental principles or any one of them contained in the ordinance and secured to the people of the Orleans territory during its existence. It follows no repugnance could arise between the ordinance of 1787 and an act of the Legislature of Louisiana or a city regulation founded on such act, and therefore this court has no jurisdiction on the last ground assumed more than on the preceding ones. In our judgment the question presented by the record is exclusively of State cognizance, and equally so in the old States and the new ones, and that the writ of error must be dismissed.

The case of Strader et al. v. Graham (10 How., 82) came from Kentucky and involved the question—whether slaves who had been permitted by their master to pass occasionally from Kentucky into Ohio acquired thereby a right to freedom after their return to Kentucky.

It was held that this was to be determined exclusively under the laws of Kentucky, and that the ordinance of 1787, as such, was without force after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The court said (pp. 96, 97):

It is undoubtedly true that most of the material provisions and principles of these six articles, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, have been the established law within this territory ever since the ordinance was passed, and hence the ordinance itself is sometimes spoken of as still in force. But these provisions owed their legal validity and force, after the Constitution was adopted and while the Territorial government continued, to the act of Congress of August 7, 1789, which adopted and continued the ordinance of 1787 and carried its provisions into execution, with some modifications which were necessary to adapt its form of government to the new constitution. And in the States since formed in the territory these provisions, so far as they have been preserved, owe their validity and authority to the Constitution of the United States and the constitution and laws of the respective States, and not to the authority of the ordinance of the old Confederation. As we have already said, it ceased to be in force upon the adoption of the constitution and can not now be the source of jurisdiction of any description in this court.

DRED SCOTT V. SANFORD (19 HOW., 393).

Among other matters considered in this case was the right of Congress by its act to exclude the institution of slavery from a proposed new State, and this involved the power of Congress to determine the domestic institutions of a new State.

In his opinion Justice Daniel approvingly quotes the letter of Madison to Robert Walsh on November 27, 1819, thus (pp. 491, 492):

* * * As to the power of admitting new States into the Federal compact, the questions offering themselves are whether Congress can attach conditions, or the new States concur in conditions, which after admission would abridge or enlarge the constitutional rights of legislation common to other States; whether Congress can, by a compact with a new State, take power either to or from itself, or place the new member above or below the equal rank and rights possessed by the others; whether all such stipulations expressed or implied would not be nullities and be so pronounced when brought to a practical test. It falls within the scope of your inquiry to state the fact that there was a proposition in the convention to discriminate between the old and the new States by an article in the Constitution. The proposition, happily, was rejected. The effect of such a discrimination is sufficiently evident.

Justice Campbell said (p. 508):

The sentiment is now general, if not universal, that Congress had no constitutional power to impose the restriction.

He says further (p. 509):

This claim to impose a restriction upon the people of Missouri involved a denial of the constitutional relations between the people of the States and Congress and affirmed a concurrent right for the latter, with their people, to constitute the social and political system of the new States. A successful maintenance of this claim would have altered the basis of the Constitution. The new States would have become members of a Union defined in part by the Constitution and in part by Congress. They would not have been admitted to "this Union." Their sovereignty would have been restricted by Congress as well as the Constitution.

Justice Curtis, in his dissenting opinion, said (pp. 587, 588):

In the legislative debates which preceded the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union this question was agitated. Its result is found in the resolution of Congress, of March 5, 1821, for the admission of that State into the Union. The constitution of Missouri, under which that State applied for admission into the Union, provided that it should be the duty of the legislature "to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in the State, under any pretext whatever." One ground of objection to the admission of the State under this constitution was that it would require the legislature to exclude free persons of color, who would be entitled, under the second section of the fourth article of the constitution, not only to come within the State, but to enjoy there the privileges and immunities of citizens. The resolution of Congress admitting the State was upon the fundamental condition "that the constitution of Missouri shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States." It is true that neither this legislative declaration, nor anything in the constitution or laws of Missouri, could confer or take away any privilege or immunity granted by the Constitution. But it is also true that it expresses the then conviction of the legislative power of the United States, that free negroes, as citizens of some of the States, might be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the States.

In Withers v. Buckley et al. (20 How., 84) was challenged a law of Mississippi for improving the navigation of one of its inland rivers as violating the provision of the enabling act which guaranteed the free navigation of the Mississippi River. The court held that there was no conflict between the statute of the State and the enabling act, and further said (p. 93):

But for argument let it be conceded that this derelict channel of the Mississippi, called Old River, is in truth a navigable river leading or flowing into the Mississippi; it would by no means follow that a diversion into the Buffalo bayou of waters, in whole or in part, which pass from Homochitto into Old River, would be a violation of the act of Congress of March 1, 1817, in its letter or its spirit, or of any condition which Congress had power to impose on the admission of the new State. It can not be imputed to Congress that they ever designed to forbid or to withhold from the State of Mississippi the power of improving the interior of that State by means either of roads or canals, or by regulating the rivers within its territorial limits, although a plan of improvement to be adopted might embrace or affect the course or the flow of rivers situated within the interior of the State. Could such an intention be ascribed to Congress, the right to enforce it may be confidently denied. Clearly Congress could exact of the new State the surrender of no attribute inherent in her character as a sovereign independent State, or indispensable to her equality with her sister States, necessarily implied and guaranteed by the very nature of the Federal compact. Obviously, and it may be said primarily, among the incidents of that equality, is the right to make improvements in the rivers, water courses, and highways situated within the State.

THE CASE OF THE KANSAS INDIANS (5 WALL., 737).

The Kansas enabling act admitted the State on condition that the Indian rights should remain unimpaired and the General Government at liberty to make any regulations respecting them which it might make if Kansas had not been admitted to the Union. The State, in violation of treaty stipulations, sought to tax Indian lands, and it was held this could not be done. The court said (pp. 755–757):

* * * If the tribal organization of the Shawnees is preserved intact and recognized by the political department of the Government as existing, then they are a "people distinct from others," capable of making treaties, separated from the jurisdiction of Kansas, and to be governed exclusively by the Government of the Union. If under the control of Congress, from necessity there can be no divided authority. If they have outlived many things, they have not outlived the protection afforded by the Constitution, treaties, and laws of Congress. It may be that they can not exist much longer as a distinct people in the presence of the civilization of Kansas, "but until they are clothed with the rights and bound to all the duties of citizens" they enjoy the privilege of total immunity from State taxation. There can be no question of State sovereignty in the case, as Kansas accepted her admission into the family of States on condition that the Indian rights should remain unimpaired and the General Government at liberty to make any regulation respecting them, their lands, property, or other rights which it would have been competent to make if Kansas had not been admitted into the Union. The treaty of 1854 left the Shawnee people a united tribe, with a declaration of their dependence upon the National Government for protection and the vindication of their rights. Ever since this their tribal organization has remained as it was before. They have elective chiefs and an elective council, meeting at stated periods, keeping a record of their proceedings, with powers regulated by custom, by which they punish offenses, adjust differences, and exercise a general oversight over the affairs of the nation. These people have their own customs and laws by which they are governed. Because some of those customs have been abandoned, owing to the proximity of their white neighbors, may be an evidence of the superior influence of our race, but does not tend to prove that their tribal organization is not preserved. There is no evidence in the record to show that the Indians with separate estates have not the same rights in the tribe as those whose estates are held in common. Their machinery of government, though simple, is adapted to their intelligence and wants and effective, with faithful agents to watch over them. If broken into, it is the natural result of Shawnees and whites owning adjoining plantations and living and trafficking together as neighbors and friends. But the action of the political department of the Government settles beyond controversy that the Shawnees are as yet a distinct people, with a perfect tribal organization. Within a very recent period their headmen negotiated a treaty with the United States, which, for some reason not explained in the record, was either not sent to the Senate or, if sent, not ratified, and they are under the charge of an agent, who constantly resides with them. While the General Government has a superintending care over their interests and continues to treat with them as a nation, the State of Kansas is estopped from denying their title to it. She accepted this status when she accepted the act admitting her into the Union. Conferring rights and privileges on these Indians can not affect their situation, which can only be changed by treaty stipulation or a voluntary abandonment of their tribal organization. As long as the United States recognizes their national character they are under the protection of treaties and the laws of Congress, and their property is withdrawn from the operation of State laws.

ESCANABA CO. V. CHICAGO (107 U. S., 678).

The enabling act for Illinois required that its constitution should be in conformity with the ordinance of 1787, and this provided that—

The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence and the carrying places between them shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said Territory as to the citizens of the United States and those of any other States that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor (p. 688).

One question in the case was as to the effect of this condition of the enabling act upon the rights and powers of the State after admission to the Union. The court said (pp. 688, 689):

The ordinance was passed July 13, 1787, one year and nearly eight months before the Constitution took effect; and, although it appears to have been treated afterwards as in force in the Territory, except as modified by Congress and by the act of May 7, 1800, chapter 41, creating the Territory of Indiana, and by the act of February 3, 1809, chapter 13, creating the Territory of Illinois, the rights and privileges granted by the ordinance are expressly secured to the inhabitants of those Territories; and, although the act of April 18, 1818, chapter 67, enabling the people of Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and the resolution of Congress of December 3, 1818, declaring the admission of the State into the Union refer to the principles of the ordinance according to which the constitution was to be formed, its provisions could not control the authority and powers of the State after her admission. Whatever the limitation upon her powers as a government whilst in a Territorial condition, whether from the ordinance of 1787 or the legislation of Congress, it ceased to have any operative force, except as voluntarily adopted by her, after she became a State of the Union. On her admission she at once became entitled to and possessed of all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States. She was admitted, and could be admitted, only on the same footing with them. The language of the resolution admitting her is "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever." (3 Stat., 536.) Equality of constitutional right and power is the condition of all the States of the Union, old and new. Illinois, therefore, as was well observed by counsel, could afterwards exercise the same power over rivers within her limits that Delaware exercised over Black Bird Creek and Pennsylvania over the Schuylkill River.

The case of Cardwell v. American Bridge Co. (113 U. S., 205) was like the preceding case, and involved the effect of the provision of the enabling act for California, that "all the navigable waters within the said State shall be common highways and forever free," and so forth.

After reviewing a number of authorities as to the powers of a State over the navigable waters, the court said (p. 210):

These cases illustrate the general doctrine, now fully recognized, that the commercial power of Congress is exclusive of State authority only when the subjects upon which it is exerted are national in their character and admit and require uniformity of regulations affecting alike all the States; and that when the subjects within that power are local in their nature or operation, or constitute mere aids to commerce, the States may provide for their regulation and management until Congress intervenes and supersedes their action.

The complainant, however, contends that Congress has intervened and expressed its will on this subject by a clause in the act of September 9, 1850 (9 Stat., 452), admitting California as a State into the Union, which declares "that all the navigable waters within the said State shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to the citizens of the United States, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor." (9 Stat., 453.) This declaration is similar to that contained in the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, so far as the latter relates to the navigable waters flowing into the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence. And in Escanaba Co. v. Chicago we held, with respect to the State of Illinois, that the clause was superseded by her admission into the Union, for she then became entitled to and possessed of all the rights of domain and sovereignty which belonged to the original States. The language of the resolution admitting her declared that it was on "an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever;" so that, after her admission, she possessed the same power over rivers within her limits that Delaware exercised over Blackbird Creek and Pennsylvania over Schuylkill River.

The two preceding cases are expressly affirmed in Huse v. Glover (119 U. S., 543); Sands v. Manistee, etc., Co. (123 U. S., 288); and Willamette, etc., Co. v. Hatch (125 U. S., 1).

Most of the cases hereinbefore cited were reviewed and reaffirmed in Ward v. Race Horse (163 U. S., 504). This case came up from Wyoming, and involved the effect of a treaty with the Bannock Indians. The enabling act for that State, however, contained no reservation in favor of Indians.

THE CASE OF BOLLN V. NEBRASKA (176 U. S., 83).

The enabling act for Nebraska provided for a constitutional convention, and required that—the members of the convention * * * shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States.

Thereupon they were authorized to form a constitution and State government. The subsequent act admitting the State into the Union, admitted it—upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

It was contended that the effect of the enabling act was to make the first eight amendments to the Federal Constitution part of the constitution of Nebraska, not subject to change by her people.

The crime charged in the case was a felony, and the prosecution was by information, and this, it was contended, was in violation of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, which prescribed that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury."

After reciting the enabling act and the act admitting Nebraska into the Union, the court said (pp. 87–89):

The argument of the plaintiff in error in this connection is that by these acts the people of Nebraska adopted the Constitution of the United States, and thereby the first eight amendments containing the Bill of Rights became incorporated in the constitution of the State, and that the right to proceed for felonies, other than by an indictment of a grand jury (as required by the fifth amendment), was taken away from such State.

But conceding all that can be claimed in this connection and that the State of Nebraska did enter the Union under the condition of the enabling act, and that it adopted the Constitution of the United States as its fundamental law, all that was meant by these words was that the State acknowledged, as every other State has done, the supremacy of the Federal Constitution. The first section of the act of 1867 admitting the State into the Union declared "that it is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever." It is impossible to suppose that by such indefinite language as was used in the enabling act Congress intended to differentiate Nebraska from her sister States, even if it had the power to do so, and attempt to impose more onerous conditions upon her than upon them, or that in cases arising in Nebraska a different construction should be given to her constitution from that given to the constitutions of other States. But this court has held in many cases that whatever be the limitations upon the power of a Territorial government they cease to have any operative force, except as voluntarily adopted after such Territory has become a State of the Union. Upon the admission of a State it becomes entitled to and possesses all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States, and, in the language of the act of 1867 admitting the State of Nebraska, it stands "upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever." (Escanaba Co., v. Chicago, 107 U. S., 678; Cardwell v. American Bridge Co., 113 U. S., 205; Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U. S., 1; Ward v. Race Horse, 163 U. S., 504.) Indeed, the legislation of Congress connected with the admission of Nebraska into the Union, so far as it bore upon the question of citizenship, was fully considered by this court in the case of Boyd v. Thayer (143 U. S., 135), and the conclusion reached that upon its admission into the Union the citizens of what had been the Territory became the citizens of the United States and of the State.

This court has also repeatedly held that the first eight amendments to the Constitution applied only to the Federal courts, and it certainly could never have been intended that these amendments should be imposed upon Nebraska, and thereby a hard and fast rule made for that State that would forever preclude amendments inconsistent with the Bill of Rights of the Federal Constitution and which this court has held to be applicable only to Federal courts. As we have repeatedly held, the fourteenth amendment was not intended to curtail the powers of the States to so amend their laws as to make them conform to the wishes of their citizens to changed views of administration, or to the exigencies of their social life. It may be readily supposed that the inhabitants of each State understand perfectly their own local needs and interests, and with the facilities with which the constitutions of the several States may be amended it is scarcely possible that any evil which might be occasioned by an improvident amendment would not be readily redressed. Not only did Congress in the act of 1867 declare that Nebraska was admitted upon an equal footing with the original States, but the whole Federal system is based upon the fundamental principle of the equality of the States under the Constitution. The idea that one State is debarred while the others are granted the privilege of amending their organic laws to conform to the wishes of their inhabitants is so repugnant to the theory of their equality under the Constitution that it can not be entertained even if Congress had power to make such discrimination. We are therefore of opinion that the provision of the constitution of Nebraska, permitting prosecutions for felony by information, does not conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In the case of Stearns v. Minnesota (179 U. S., 223) the domestic institutions of the State were not involved, but only the effect of a grant of lands made by the United States to the State of Minnesota in the enabling act upon the conditions accepted by the State in its constitution. The conditions are set out in the extract from the opinion of the court, viz (pp. 243–245):

When Minnesota was admitted into the Union, and admitted on the basis of full equality with all other States, there was within its limits a large amount of lands belonging to the National Government. The enabling act, February 26, 1857 (11 Stat., 166), authorizing the inhabitants of Minnesota to form a constitution and a State government tendered certain propositions to the people of the Territory, coupled in section 5 with this proviso (11 Stat., 167):

"The foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the said convention which shall form the constitution of said State shall provide, by a clause in said constitution or an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall nonresident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

And article 2, section 3, of the constitution, passed by virtue of this enabling act, reads as follows (Gen. Stat., Minn., 1894, p. 74):

"The propositions contained in the act of Congress entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States,' are hereby accepted, ratified, and confirmed and shall remain irrevocable without the consent of the United States; and it is hereby ordained that this State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title to said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and in no case shall nonresident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

That these provisions of the enabling act and the constitution, in form at least, made a compact between the United States and the State, is evident. In an inquiry as to the validity of such a compact this distinction must at the outset be noticed. There may be agreements or compacts attempted to be entered into between two States, or between a State and the Nation, in reference to political rights and obligations, and there may be those solely in reference to property belonging to one or the other. That different considerations may underlie the question as to the validity of these two kinds of compacts or agreements is obvious. It has often been said that a State admitted into the Union enters therein in full equality with all the others, and such equality may forbid any agreement or compact limiting or qualifying political rights and obligations; whereas, on the other hand, a mere agreement in reference to property involves no question of equality of status, but only of the power of a State to deal with the Nation or with any other State in reference to such property. The case before us is one involving simply an agreement as to the property between a State and the Nation.

In the case of Mobile, etc., Co. v. Mobile (187 U. S., 479), Pollard's lessee v. Hagan, cited above, is approved. So also in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46).

The treaty of 1859 reserved to the Yakima Indians certain rights of taking fish.

It was contended in United States v. Winans (198 U. S., 371) that this right of the Indians became subordinate to the powers of the State of Washington upon its admission into the Union "upon an equal footing with the original States."

The court, citing Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1), held that Congress had the power to make grants of land below high-water mark of navigable waters in any Territory of the United States whenever necessary to perform international obligations, to improve the lands, promote foreign and interstate commerce, or carry out other public purposes appropriate to the objects for which the United States held the Territory. Coming to the case in hand, the court said (p. 384):

> The extinguishment of the Indian title, opening the land for settlement and preparing the way for future States, was appropriate to the objects for which the United States held the territory. And surely it was within the competency of the Nation to secure to the Indians such a remnant of the great rights they possessed as "taking fish at all usual and accustomed places." Nor does it restrain the State unreasonably, if at all, in the regulation of the right. It only fixes in the land such easements as enables the right to be exercised.

In the case of Dick v. United States (208 U. S., 340) it was held that the United States, under an agreement made with the Nez Perce Indians in 1893, retained control over lands in Idaho to which the Indian title had been extinguished for the purpose of controlling the use of liquor therein after Idaho had been admitted as a State. The period for which control was reserved was 25 years. The court said (p. 359):

> We go no further in this case than to say that the requirement, in the agreement of 1893, that the Federal liquor statutes protecting the Indian country against the introduction of intoxicants into it should, for the limited period of 25 years, be the law for the lands ceded and retained by, as well as the lands allotted to, the Nez Perce Indians, was a valid regulation based upon the treaty-making power of the United States and upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce with those Indians, and was not inconsistent, in any substantial sense, with the constitutional principle that a new State comes into the Union upon entire equality with the original States.

CONCLUSIONS AS TO POWER OF CONGRESS.

What has been stated shows that the States of the Union, new and old, stand upon the same footing of right, power, and sovereignty. Congress, as it has the sole power to admit new States, and as this power is in nowise qualified or circumscribed by the Constitution, may refuse to admit a Territory as a State for a good reason or bad, or for no reason at all. It may, therefore, prescribe conditions of admission and may determine the constitution which shall be adopted; but when the State is in the Union its sovereignty is as full and unimpaired as that of the other States.

Conditions imposed will be binding upon the State if their subject matter is one over which, as to all the States, the Constitution of the United States has conferred paramount authority upon Congress, and also if their subject matter is property and the conditions imposed are in the nature of a property contract between the State and the United States.

A condition, however, which relates to the government of the State (provided only that government be republican in form), or to its domestic institutions or policies, or the mode of amending its constitution and the tenure of its officials, no matter in what manner imposed, nor how solemnly assented to by the people of the proposed State, nevertheless, upon the admission of the State into the Union, and by virtue of that fact, loses all its force alike as an enactment of Congress and as a compact between the State and the United States, and has validity thereafter only if and because it was adopted by the people of the State, and then only so long as it is assented to by them and remains unchanged by them.

Mr. Chairman, it is quite within the power of Congress to prescribe the constitution which shall be adopted by New Mexico or Arizona. We may require them to put in any provision within our sweet will. I have often questioned the desirability of requiring them to insert in their constitution provisions which are already binding upon them by reason of the Constitution of the United States, or requiring them to insert other provisions in their constitution. But whether they do or not, so long as these Territories shall be admitted as States in the Union, our power over them and their constitution as to the domestic institutions of their States has passed from us and is within their control.

I notice for instance, and I have no criticism of it, in the substitute resolution presented by the committee it is proposed to amend the enabling act as to that part of it that requires the officials of New Mexico to be able to speak English. That provision is already in the constitution of New Mexico as presented to us. I do not propose at this time to discuss the desirability of its being there, although I have grave doubt about it. But it could do no possible good, and probably no possible harm, to now amend the enabling act as proposed by the resolution, which resolution if adopted will admit New Mexico as a State in the Union, with that provision in her constitution which we do not propose now to amend but only propose to amend the enabling act. That can be of no possible benefit, because as soon as the State is admitted into the Union, that provision in the enabling act is as dead as a doornail, and no longer has any force or validity. The provision has no force except as included in the constitution which is adopted when the State is brought in. We have the power to keep out Territories, and we have the power to admit them.

The enabling act provided for the approval of the constitutions by the President and by Congress under certain conditions. That we have the power to do. The joint resolution disregards that provision of the enabling act entirely, and proposes to admit the Territories as States into the Union. That we have full power to do. We are not bound by the enabling act as to the admission of these Territories into the Union. We have the same power to disregard the enabling act that we have any other law when we pass a new law, and while the joint resolution, for convenience sake, recognizes certain things in the enabling act, it is not proposed under the joint resolution to bring the States into the Union under the enabling act, nor is it at all necessary to do so. We could pass a law admitting Arizona and New Mexico into the Union and providing only that they should assemble a convention to adopt a new constitution without our approving it in any respect whatever.

It is true that the Constitution says that the United States shall guarantee to each State in the Union a republican form of government. But no one knows what that means, or, if they do, how it could be enforced. It does not provide for putting out of the Union a State. There is no such authority. Neither Congress nor the State can put a State out of the Union, as we discovered a few years ago.

Mr. GRAHAM. They might suspend its right to representation in the Congress.

Mr. MANN. I do not think they could suspend its right to representation in Congress at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. At least that is as far as they could go, if they could go that far.

Mr. MANN. Yes. It is possible that if a monarchy should be set up in one of the States of the Union Congress might pass a resolution declaring that that was not a republican form of government, and that the court might be able to hold under the provision of the Constitution or the resolution, or perhaps without the resolution, that the laws of that State were violative and unconstitutional, and that the Supreme Court could enter an order which would cause the President of the United States to send an army into a State to enforce the orders of the court. But that question probably will never arise. Let us hope not.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not, as a matter of fact, that the joint resolution or substitute carried into the present one all the provisions of the original enabling act, and therefore that the President must, if the enabling act must be complied with, still approve the constitution of Arizona?

Mr. MANN. I should say, clearly not. We have in the resolution—and there is no reason why we should not—entirely disregarded the enabling act so far as the question of admission is concerned. The enabling act provides that the States shall be admitted when certain events take place. It is provided by the joint resolution that the States shall be admitted upon entirely different events taking place, and that is wholly within the power of Congress to do as they please about it. Of course the joint resolution, being a joint resolution, must be submitted to the President for his approval or disapproval under the Constitution. If the President approves it, it may be said in a way that he approves the constitution, he approves the joint resolution; but if he disapproves it, it is returned to Congress, and if Congress passes the joint resolution over the President's veto Arizona and New Mexico would be admitted into the Union, no matter what the opinion of the President might be on the subject of the constitution.

Mr. RAKER. Let us see whether that is the fact or not. On line 6, page 3, of the joint resolution it is provided as follows:

That the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States—

Now, if it stopped there there would be no question on earth, but it says further—in accordance with the terms of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910.

Does that not carry in all of the provisions of the enabling act, unless hereafter in this joint resolution they are in direct conflict therewith?

Mr. MANN. I have no hesitation whatever in answering that—that refers to the enabling act, as I stated before, as a mere matter of convenience in reference to the terms, such as the terms in reference to lands, property——

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman's whole argument has been an answer to it.

Mr. MANN. And things of that sort, and that our power to admit under the Constitution is what this resolution is offered under. Of course its admission comes only after the proclamation of the President, but the President is required in a certain event to issue a proclamation after an election is held in Arizona and New Mexico. Nor do those Territories have any control over the question whether such an election shall be held or not under the terms of the resolution. The election is held by reason of the passage of the joint resolution, if it passes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I would like about 10 minutes more.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I have said what I did because myself and some others became somewhat interested in the subject, and one other gentleman helped me prepare the brief which I have presented to the House, and I thought it might be desirable to print it, as it was interesting to me.

I now wish to say a word or two, however, on the subject of the recall.

Mr. Chairman, the Arizona constitution brings before us some propositions which have been widely discussed in various parts of the country, but which so far no one, I believe, has proposed shall be enacted into national laws. I refer especially to the initiative, referendum, and recall.

I am particularly opposed to the recall of judges. A free, independent, and honest judiciary is at the bottom of our system of government. Legislators are supposed to be directly influenced and controlled more or less by popular sentiment and the passing craze of the hour. The legislature may pass a law to-day and repeal it to-morrow, because it is the duty of the legislature to make law, not to determine what the law already is.

The judge, however, finds what the law is and he can not find that the law is one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow if no legislative change has been made. It is the duty of the judge to determine what the law is, not what he may fancy it ought to be. In determining what the law is, the judge ought not to be controlled by passing passion or hysterical opinion.

To hold over every judge the threat that if he does not render a popular opinion of the law he shall be subjected to a campaign before the people to hold his office is to largely destroy his independence and his usefulness.

The Arizona constitution provides that upon petition of 25 per cent of the voters an election shall be held to determine whether a public official shall be recalled or, in other words, removed. To apply this to judges is destructive of a fair judiciary.

We undertake now to provide an unbiased judge and an unbiased jury. We provide a method by which a change of venue can be taken from a judge who is believed to have undue bias for or against one of the parties to a suit or criminal prosecution, and yet the recall system would render every judge biased either for or against the popular side of a great case where the public had become aroused.

No one claims that judges are perfect or that judicial decisions are always correct. Judges are often ignorant of the law and sometimes are swayed by passion or improper considerations. But the remedy proposed would be far worse than any evil now existing.

I am opposed to admitting Arizona as a State unless she amends her constitution so that the recall of public officers shall not apply to judges.

I do not specially favor the initiative, the referendum, or the recall of public officers, but I should not vote to refuse Arizona admission as a State because she has those idiosyncrasies in her constitution. In my opinion, the initiative and referendum and recall will be tried by various States of the Union, and will in the end be practically abandoned. These propositions will break down of their own weight.

I have been in legislative bodies now for many years. The difficulty with legislation is not in enunciating general principles, but it is in applying those principles in detail to all cases alike. But the details of legislation are the important parts of legislation. For instance, everyone is in favor of conservation of national resources, as a general proposition, but when it comes to the application of that proposition in detail, I have never seen anyone yet who was prepared to answer some of the simple questions which arise. Such propositions can be worked out in detail only by experienced legislators and experienced administrators of the law. To submit the general proposition to a vote of the people does no good, and often will permit the legislator to avoid the necessity of really working out the particular problem. To submit the details of such legislation to a popular vote of the people is to ask them to judge of something about which it is impossible for them to know, and such a system would permit the legislator to rely upon the popular vote and to escape the necessity of thorough examination of the subject himself.

Many a bond issue has been voted by the people which was wholly unjustified by the situation. The legislator votes to submit the bond issue to a vote of the people without full knowledge of the subject himself and without taking the trouble to carefully study the subject himself. Instead of learning everything there is to know about the matter and determining it upon his own responsibility in the interest of what he believes to be the good of the people, he will give it only casual examination, and say "Let the people decide," hiding his own responsibility behind the proposition to submit the matter to the people. And often the people have voted for a bond issue because they innocently believed that the legislative body would not submit the proposition to them unless it had been carefully weighed and found to be to their interest.

It will be so about most legislative propositions which would be submitted on a referendum or the initiative. General propositions may be indorsed, but the details will not be studied carefully or worked out with thoroughness. The initiative and the referendum are the boon of the lazy legislator. [Laughter.] They enable him to escape the necessity of study or thought. He avoids responsibility by putting it on somebody else. But the proper system of legislation, it seems to me, is for the people, in their wisdom, to select competent men to represent them in the legislative bodies, to require those men on their peril to study the subjects of legislation, and to enact on their responsibility legislation which will be judged by the people by its results.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman submit to a question there?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. So far as shirking or evading the responsibility of the legislator is concerned, will the establishment of the referendum add to the difficulty that now exists because of our Supreme Court plan? Do not the legislators to-day evade their responsibility on the theory that if a law is not sound the Supreme Court will say so, and it does not matter whether they investigate that question or not?

Mr. MANN. I have often thought that when I have seen bills come before the House, and have frequently expressed that view.

Mr. GRAHAM. And not only the House but the State legislatures.

Mr. MANN. Everybody avoids responsibility sometimes, when he can. But does anybody think that under the law and the Constitution, as it now is, when Congress sometimes shirks responsibilities about laws—as to their constitutionality—because they can be passed upon by the Supreme Court, it will aid any by giving another excuse of passing everything on to the people without taking the responsibility which Members ought to take, to know and investigate on their own responsibility? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLDFIELD). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. If the body of electors are not able to select competent men to represent them, what reason is there to believe that they will be wiser in determining the legislative propositions which may be submitted to them? If the voters are unable to wisely choose their representatives in the legislative body, how will they with greater wisdom pass upon the numerous legislative propositions submitted to them, about which it will often be impossible for them to be well informed, if they have any other duties to perform?

Mr. Chairman, Members of Congress are elected for a term of two years. They practically experience a recall every two years. I believe it is the consensus of opinion that if the Constitution were to be rewritten in this particular the term of a Member of Congress would now be made longer than two years. The reelection or recall every two years—and I measure my words when I say it—destroys half of the usefulness of half the Members of this House. I do not believe it makes them any more responsive to the will of the people.

My own district has been very kind to me. I believe that the voters who have sent me here for many years believe it is my duty to become informed upon the public questions of the day, both by consultation with them and by other study of the subjects, and that they expect when I have reached an honest conclusion, based upon intelligent study, I will express that honest opinion by my acts and votes.

I have always endeavored to know the beliefs and wishes of my constituents and have tried to ascertain whether those beliefs were fundamental or based upon passing excitement. But I do not believe that my constituents would honor me if they thought that my votes in this House were based, not upon honest and considered judgment, but upon a mere estimate of popular excitement or agitation at home.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that many of the popular reform movements of the country are too often based only upon propositions to change merely the methods of legislation or merely the methods of accomplishing results. After all, the important thing about government and about legislation is the accomplishment of the result. New problems are constantly arising in every government and in every land—problems that require for their solution the best-applied genius and the most arduous study of our greatest men and women. And those people who fondly believe they are in the van of reform movements because they are urging different methods of selecting legislators or different methods of enacting legislation are, after all, dealing only with the nonessentials and have not yet engaged upon a study of the great essentials of government, which are not form, but substance; not methods, but results. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, before beginning, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, there is no power conferred by the Federal Constitution upon Congress which requires to be exercised with more care than the power to admit new States into this Union. The addition of a new star to the flag—the admission of a new member into the sisterhood of States, upon an equal footing with all the others—is a matter which may well command our sober, serious consideration. And so it is that for days we have been listening to exceedingly able and eloquent speeches upon the republican form of government, upon State governments, State constitutions, and constitutions generally. It is not my purpose to enter very far into that wide field of discussion, interesting and important though it is. I shall endeavor to confine myself more closely to the matter immediately before us, requiring our careful consideration and treatment, in the disposition of the pending resolution.

It is entitled "Joint resolution approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona." So it was in its original form, but as it is proposed—by the majority of the Committee on Territories—to be amended, it disapproves both those constitutions and provides for their amendment.

The last Congress passed and, on June 20, 1910, the President approved—

> An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

These Territories have been for a long time clamoring for admission. For 60 years the people of New Mexico have been knocking at the door of Congress. It is related that once, 36 or 37 years ago, they came so close that it was merely as the result of an extraneous incident, so to speak—the shaking of hands between two gentlemen upon this floor—that they were not admitted to statehood then. A Member had made a speech commenting in very severe and unkind terms upon a large section of this country. At its conclusion the then Delegate from New Mexico walked across the Hall and, by way of congratulation, shook hands with him, thus offending enough Members from that section to bring about the defeat of the proposition to admit New Mexico as a State.

But, now, in pursuance of this enabling act, passed by this Congress one year ago, a constitutional convention has been called in New Mexico; the delegates were elected by the people of New Mexico; they assembled as required by this enabling act; they framed a constitution; they submitted that constitution to the people. The enabling act provided that they might submit a constitution as a whole to be voted upon as a whole, and also separate provisions to be voted upon separately.

The people voted. They ratified the constitution so proposed by the constitutional convention, by a majority of 18,000, in that State whose total vote is just about that of a congressional district in Pennsylvania, thus showing a great degree of unanimity in the adoption of their constitution. The enabling act provided that in the event of its rejection by the people a second constitutional convention should be called which should frame a new constitution to be in like manner submitted to the people. But the first constitution submitted was adopted by an overwhelming majority.

Under the enabling act of 1910, when the constitution so adopted was certified to the President of the United States, he was in turn to certify it to Congress. If he approved it and Congress approved it, New Mexico was to become immediately a State. Should the President approve it and Congress fail to disapprove, then, at the end of the next regular session of Congress, New Mexico was to become immediately a State. The constitution adopted by the people of New Mexico was duly certified to the President, who in turn forwarded it to Congress on the 24th of February, 1911, with a message, in which he said, "I have given my formal approval; I recommend the approval of the same by Congress." The House did approve it, and sent it over to the Senate. I have never heard that there was any objection there to the constitution, but the session was nearly ended and the matter was not reached for action.

Now, if nothing is done by this Congress, then, at the end of the next regular session, New Mexico becomes a State by the terms of the enabling act. But this resolution proposes to do something. In its original form it approved the New Mexico constitution, but in its amended form it disapproves of that constitution, and the adoption of the resolution would cause delay in the admission of that Territory as a State. So far as New Mexico is concerned, it were better that we take no action at all.

To require any change at all is to disapprove the constitution in its present form, and disapproval by Congress delays statehood. The change suggested is not worth that delay. The only thing proposed to be changed is the nineteenth article, upon the subject of amendments. Gentlemen have argued at great length here that in its present form this is a horrible constitution, impossible of amendment under its present terms, and that it ought to be amended so as to make it more easily subject to amendment by the people of the State.

The principal provisions which the gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Territories thought they might desire to amend hereafter were those touching railroads, which were declared "drastic and nugatory"; some suggestion was made on the subject of taxation, and one of them said "the proposition for recall was never before us, but we did want the initiative and referendum."

I am not going to discuss the initiative and referendum. If the people of New Mexico want them, I am willing that they shall have them. I am not here to say that with those features in the constitution they would not still have a republican form of government. They can, when they become a State, amend their constitution to secure the initiative and referendum, but we ought not to delay statehood. I am going to call your attention and theirs to a high Democratic authority. You have all heard of Woodrow Wilson, recently elected and now serving as governor of New Jersey. He is a prominent man, very much in the limelight at the present time. A newspaper correspondent, writing from Washington the other day, said that four-fifths of the Members on that side of the Chamber—the Democratic side—were in favor of his nomination for the Presidency.

I do not agree with that. I believe that four-fifths of you on that side favor the nomination of the distinguished Speaker of this House, the honorable CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.] I believe that if we were to have a Democratic President next time, which God forbid, four-fifths of the Members on this side of the House would rather see CHAMP CLARK occupy that high position than any other Democrat. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM. If you wanted us to join the applause you should have left out the "God forbid." [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Wilson is an eminent writer and a very distinguished man. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen on that side of the Chamber particularly to what Mr. Wilson has said in his very justly celebrated work entitled "The State," published in 1898, when he was not in the whirlpool of politics, and had nothing to disturb the calm reflection of his great mind and brain. I am not going to read all that he has written. He discusses at length the operation of the initiative and referendum in Switzerland, which he very truly says is unusually well adapted to their use because of the smallness of the cantons and because the people so live in close proximity to each other that they can readily get together to consult about matters of government. I read from page 309 of his book:

Although the people have delegated their legislative powers to representative chambers in all the Cantons except those which still retain their primitive Landsgemeinden, they have, nevertheless, kept in their own hands more than the mere right to elect representatives. The largest of the Cantons (Berne) has but a little more than half a million inhabitants; the majority of the Cantons have less than 100,000 apiece; and the average population, taking big and little Cantons together, is only about 120,000. Their average area scarcely reaches 640 square miles. The people of such communities stand, as it were, in the midst of affairs. They are in a sense always at hand to judge of the conduct of the public business. Their feelings and their interests are homogeneous, and there is the less necessity to part with their powers to representatives. In seven of the German Cantons a certain number of citizens (the number varies from one to twelve thousands) can demand a popular vote upon the question whether the Great Council shall be dissolved or not; and, if the vote goes in the affirmative, the chamber's term is ended and a new election takes place at once. If this method of control is no longer used it is because more effective methods have been substituted. In almost all the Cantons the question of constitutional revision can be brought to popular vote upon petition, and the revision, if undertaken, may go any length in changing or reversing the processes of legislation.

And then on page 311 he sums up the matter with reference to the initiative as follows:

The initiative has been very little used, having given place in practice, for the most part, to the referendum. Where it has been employed it has not promised either progress or enlightenment, leading rather to doubtful experiments and to reactionary displays of prejudice than to really useful legislation.

In both of the great Cantons of Zurich and Berne, the most populous and influential in the Confederation, it has been used to abolish compulsory vaccination. It was established for the Confederation only six years ago (1891), and has been used in Federal legislation only to aim a blow at the Jews under the disguise of a law, forbidding the slaughtering of animals by bleeding.

In an earlier work published in 1893 and entitled "Character of Democracy in the United States" Prof. Wilson had already said:

Questions of government are infinitely complex questions, and no multitude can of themselves form clear-cut, comprehensive, consistent conclusions touching them. Yet without such conclusions, without single and prompt purposes, government can not be carried on. Neither legislation nor administration can be done at the ballot box. The people can only accept the governing act of representatives.

And again in the same work he said:

Every one now knows familiarly enough how we accomplished the wide aggregations of self-government characteristic of the modern time; how we have articulated governments as vast and yet as whole as continents like our own. The instrumentality has been representation, of which the ancient world knew nothing, and lacking which it always lacked national integration. Because of representation and the railroads to carry representatives to distant capitals, we have been able to rear colossal structures like the Government of the United States as easily as the ancients gave political organization to a city, and our great building is as stout as was their little one.

I quote again from Prof. Wilson's work "The State" upon the subject of referendum. At pages 312–313 he says:

Origin of the referendum: The term referendum is as old as the sixteenth century, and contains a reminiscence of the strictly federal beginnings of government in two of the present cantons of the confederation—Graubunden, mainly, and Valais. These cantons were not at that time members of the confederation, but merely districts allied to it (zugewandete orte). Within themselves they constituted very loose confederacies of communes (in Graubunden, 3; in Valais, 12). The delegates whom the communes sent to the federal assembly of the district had to report every question of importance to their constitutents and crave instruction as to how they should vote upon it. This was the original referendum. It had a partial counterpart in the constitution of the confederation down to the formation of the present forms of government in 1848. Before that date the members of the central council of the confederation acted always under instructions from their respective cantons, and upon questions not covered by their instructions, as well as upon all matters of unusual importance, it was their duty to seek special direction from the home governments. They were said to be commissioned ad audiendum et referendum. The referendum as now adopted by almost all the cantons bears the radically changed character of legislation by the people. Only its name now gives testimony as to its origin.

658. Its origin: In respect of constitutional changes the use of the referendum is not peculiar to Switzerland. In that field its use in this country is older than its use in Switzerland. And in its application to ordinary laws it is modern even in Switzerland. Its earliest adoption was in 1852, and it was not until the decade 1864–1874 that it won its way into the constitutional practice of the greater Cantons. Its use, therefore, is everywhere new, and the experience by which we must judge of it is recent and partial. It is still tested only in part. It has led in most cases to the rejection of radical legislation, even to the rejection of radical labor legislation, such as the ordinary voter might be expected to accept with avidity. The Swiss population, being homogeneous and deeply conservative, have resisted as perhaps no other people have the infection of modern radical opinion. They have shown themselves apt to reject, also, complicated measures which they do not fully comprehend and measures involving expense which seems to them unnecessary.

And yet they have shown themselves not a little indifferent, too. The vote upon most measures submitted to the ballot is usually very light; there is not much popular discussion, and the referendum by no means creates that quick interest in affairs which its originators had hoped to see it excite. It has dulled the sense of responsibility among legislators without, in fact, quickening the people to the exercise of any real control in affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would ask the gentleman what time it was that Mr. Wilson made that statement?

Mr. OLMSTED. The book is dated 1898.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He may have become converted by this time.

Mr. OLMSTED. In order to do exact justice to him, I was about to call attention to the fact that, according to this morning's New York Sun, Prof. Wilson, in an address delivered at Portland, Oreg., yesterday spoke approvingly of the initiative and referendum and direct primary as used in that State. Without having his speech before us, we can not, of course, tell to what extent, if any, he has modified his opinions, so clearly set forth in his writings, as I have shown you. In the same speech he opposed the recall as applied to judges.

I am not opposing the initiative and referendum. The people of New Mexico can readily secure them by amending this constitution which they have already adopted. I am merely trying to show that there is nothing about the initiative and referendum proposition which would justify us in delaying statehood to these people, nor making it important to make the constitution they have already adopted more easily amendable by themselves after they have been admitted as a State. As a matter of fact, as anybody may see by reference to the fourth article of this constitution of New Mexico, the referendum is already provided.

REFERENDUM ALREADY PROVIDED FOR.

It is in article 4 expressly specified that—

The people reserve the power to disapprove, suspend, and annul any law enacted by the legislature, except general appropriation laws—and certain other laws therein specified. And it further provides that—

Petitions disapproving any law other than those above excepted, enacted at the last preceding session of the legislature, shall be filed with the secretary of state not less than four months prior to the next general election. Such petitions shall be signed by not less than 10 per cent of the qualified electors of each of three-fourths of the counties and in the aggregate by not less than 10 per cent of the qualified electors of the State, as shown by the total number of votes cast at the last preceding general election.

The question of the approval or rejection of such law shall be submitted by the secretary of state to the electorate at the next general election; and if a majority of the legal votes cast thereon, and not less than 40 per cent of the total number of legal votes cast at such general election be cast for the rejection of such law, it shall be annulled and thereby repealed with the same effect as if the legislature had then repealed it, and such repeal shall revive any law repealed by the act so annulled; otherwise it shall remain in force unless subsequently repealed by the legislature. If such petition or petitions be signed by not less than 25 per cent of the qualified electors under each of the foregoing conditions, and be filed with the secretary of state within 90 days after the adjournment of the session of the legislature at which such law was enacted, the operation thereof shall be thereupon suspended and the question of its approval or rejection shall be likewise submitted to a vote at the next ensuing general election. If a majority of the votes cast thereon and not less than 40 per cent of the total number of votes cast at such general election be cast for its rejection, it shall be thereby annulled; otherwise it shall go into effect upon publication of the certificate of the secretary of state declaring the result of the vote thereon. It shall be a felony for any person to sign any such petition with any name other than his own, or to sign his name more than once for the same measure, or to sign such petition when he is not a qualified elector in the county specified in such petition: Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit the writing thereon of the name of any person who can not write, and who signs the same with his mark. The legislature shall enact laws necessary for the effective exercise of the power hereby reserved.

Briefly stated, on petition of 10 per cent of the qualified voters of the State any law not of the excepted class must be submitted to the people for their approval or rejection. If 25 per cent sign, the law is instantly suspended until after the people shall have voted thereon. This is the referendum clearly provided for in the constitution as it now stands. There is no occasion to delay statehood on that account.

INITIATIVE ALSO PROVIDED FOR.

Then, over in section 3 of article 19 we find this:

If this constitution be in any way so amended as to allow laws to be enacted by direct vote of the electors, the laws which may be so enacted shall be only such as might be enacted by the legislature under the provisions of this constitution.

That contemplates that the constitution may be so amended by the people as to provide for the initiative. There is no occasion for the delay of statehood on that account.

A GOOD CONSTITUTION.

I shall presently show you that the constitution of New Mexico, already adopted, is not so difficult of amendment as we have been told, but before proceeding to that I shall show you that the constitution already adopted by the people of that Territory is a very good constitution as it now stands, and that it is not subject to the objections which have been urged against it. Mr. H. D. Fergusson, who appeared before the Committee on Territories, complained that the provisions as to railroads were "drastic and nugatory." They certainly are drastic; but if they are nugatory, I have failed to discover the fact.

Mr. GRAHAM. How could it be nugatory if it was too drastic?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not know; but that is the objection he stated.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is drastic in its provisions, but nugatory in the fact that the commission had no power to carry it out. That is the idea I understand.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think I shall be able to show you that it has more power than the railroad commission of any other State in the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think the compensation allowed the commissioners is out of all reason for the amount of work they are expected to do? Is it not a fact that you pay your district judges $4,500 and pay these men only $1,500? My State would reverse that. I think the commissioners ought to be paid as much as a Federal judge. You pay your supreme judges there under this constitution $6,000 and pay your commissioners the magnificent sum of one-half that.

Mr. OLMSTED. The question of salary is a question for the people of New Mexico. I think myself that the salary is small, but it is a new State, and it is a highly honorable position. A great many men are willing to serve for honor, just as we do in Congress. As a matter of fact, however, the salary is $3,000.

Then Mr. W. R. McGill told the Committee on Territories, as his chief reason why the constitution should be made more easily amendable before statehood is granted, that—

New Mexico is the worst corporation-ridden country and political-machine country that there is to-day in this American Union. I want to say to you, sirs, that for the last 12 years or more, possibly, the public affairs of this country have been run entirely by gang politicians and corporation interests, and consequently that same gang or that same crowd that have run that country have also formulated this constitution and presented it to our people. I need not tell you that it was done by these gang politicians and corporation interests when you read this constitution.

Now he wants to submit amendments to this same corporation-ridden, gang-controlled people. What kind of amendments would he probably get? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that as everybody there—all kinds of people, and the corporations and gang politicians as well—wanted statehood, they all united and put their best foot forward to get a constitution that they believed would be approved by the President and by Congress. Under those conditions they made a better constitution than they would be likely to make after they have acquired statehood and are no longer subject to Congress or the approval of the President, particularly if they are so bound down, so ridden, and so controlled as gentlemen would have us believe.

But let us see if this constitution does bear evidence of corrupt or improper influence.

In the first place it contains a splendid declaration of rights. It declares, among other things, that—

SEC. 2. All political power is vested in and derived from the people; all government of right originates with the people, is founded upon their will, and is instituted solely for their good.

SEC. 3. The people of the State have the sole and exclusive right to govern themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State.

There are 22 express declarations of rights of the people, and then a provision that—

The enumeration in this constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny, impair, or disparage others retained by the people.

Here is a provision upon the subject of elections:

All elections shall be free and open, and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage.

Here is another:

The legislature shall have the power to require the registration of the qualified electors as a requisite for voting, and shall regulate the manner, time, and places of voting. The legislature shall enact such laws as will secure the secrecy of the ballot, the purity of elections, and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise. Not more than two members of the board of registration and not more than two judges of election shall belong to the same political party at the time of their appointment.

Those provisions do not appear to have been written for the special benefit of gang politicians. And there are many others of like import to be found herein.

Now, as to corporations, here is this provision in section 26 of article 4:

The legislature shall not grant to any corporation or person any rights, franchises, privileges, immunities, or exemptions which shall not, upon the same terms and under like conditions, inure equally to all persons or corporations; no exclusive right, franchise, privilege, or immunity shall be granted by the legislature or any municipality in this State.

And then in section 37:

It shall not be lawful for a member of the legislature to use a pass or to purchase or receive transportation over any railroad upon terms not open to the general public, and a violation of this section shall work a forfeiture of the office.

And then in section 38 it provides that—

The legislature shall enact laws to prevent trusts, monopolies, and combinations in restraint of trade.

It does not say whether reasonable or unreasonable.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was written before the Supreme Court amended the law.

Mr. OLMSTED. And again, in sections 13 and 14 of article 11, we find this:

SEC. 13. The legislature shall provide for the organization of corporations by general law. All laws relating to corporations may be altered, amended, or repealed by the legislature at any time, when necessary for the public good and general welfare, and all corporations doing business in this State may, as to such business, be regulated, limited, or restrained by laws not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or of this constitution.

SEC. 14. The police power of this State is supreme over all corporations as well as individuals.

And again, in section 18:

SEC. 18. The right of eminent domain shall never be so abridged or construed as to prevent the legislature from taking the property and franchises of incorporated companies and subjecting them to the public use the same as the property of individuals.

And so all the way through this constitution we find provisions regulating and controlling corporations, more drastic, I may say, than can be found in the existing constitution of any State in this Union. Now, as to railroads.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that the claim is put forward by its advocates as to the corporation provision in this constitution that it was framed after the Virginia constitutional article on the same subject.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have not yet reached the railroad provision. I am about to take that up. It has been condemned loudly by several gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject. Now, what is it? Here is a State corporation commission to be chosen at the first election for State officers. There are to be six members. Those chosen at the first election are to hold office for different terms. They are to retire one at a time, so that there is to be an election each year for one State corporation commissioner. No officer, agent, or employee of or person financially interested in any railway, express, or other kind of corporation can be a member of that commission. Section 6 of article 11 says:

Subject to the provisions of this constitution, and of such requirements, rules, and regulations as may be prescribed by law, the State corporation commission shall be the department of government through which shall be issued all charters for domestic corporations and amendments or extensions thereof.

No powers are to be taken away from the legislature. The commission is to operate under the law as enacted by the legislature and under the powers thereby given.

Section 7 says:

The commission shall have power and be charged with the duty of fixing, determining, supervising, regulating, and controlling all charges and rates of railway, express, telegraph, telephone, sleeping-car, and other transportation and transmission companies and common carriers within the State; to require railway companies to provide and maintain adequate depots, stock pens, station buildings, agents, and facilities for the accommodation of passengers and for receiving and delivering freight and express; and to provide and maintain necessary crossings, culverts, and sidings upon and alongside of their roadbeds whenever, in the judgment of the commission, the public interests demand and as may be reasonable and just.

It also enumerates a good many other powers, to change or alter rates, and so forth, which I will not stop to read. The commission is given power to subpœna witnesses and enforce their attendance.

The commission shall have power to subpœna witnesses and enforce their attendance before the commission, through any district court or the supreme court of the State, and through such court to punish for contempt, etc.

That is just as the Interstate Commerce Commission was in the first instance authorized to enforce its subpœnas. Then, when this commission has made an order, either side can appeal to the court. Why should anyone object to that? Why should there not be an appeal to the court? Then that section continues:

The supreme court, for the consideration of such causes, arising hereunder, shall be in session at all times, and shall give precedence to such causes. Any party to such hearing before the commission shall have the same right to remove the order entered therein to the supreme court of the State, as given under the provisions hereof, to the company or corporation against which such order is directed.

It is a very elaborate provision. Very elaborate and definite powers are conferred upon this commission for the thorough and complete regulation of all these corporations. It is idle to contend that corporations are responsible for these provisions; it is more likely that they were inserted by anticorporationists.

But my friend from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] said yesterday that they all ought to have been left to the legislature. How could the legislature sit and take testimony and determine what would be reasonable rates in particular cases? The Legislature of Pennsylvania tried the fixing of rates arbitrarily, and the court held it to be unconstitutional. The legislature, without evidence before it, could not determine whether rates were reasonable or unreasonable.

The court declared in substance that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a rate must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case.

This constitution of New Mexico provides for that State just such machinery as Congress provided for interstate railroads by creating a commission to determine these matters. The commission is given full and complete powers over such corporations. No other State constitution provides for their more complete regulation. One gentleman who appeared before the committee complained that "as it was first proposed" the constitution provided that 1,000,000 acres of land underlaid with coal should be taxed as grazing land. We need not concern ourselves about what may have been "at first proposed" if it did not finally get into the constitution. There is nothing of the kind in it. I am certain nobody wants it amended in that way now. Its provisions upon the subject of taxation are all that any fair-minded man could desire.

In article 8, section 1, it is provided that—

The rate of taxation shall be equal and uniform upon all subjects of taxation.

In section 8 of that article it is expressly provided that—

The power to license and tax corporations and corporate property shall not be relinquished by the State or any subdivision thereof.

In section 9 it is provided that—

All property within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax and subject to taxation shall be taxed therein for State, county, municipal, and other purposes: Provided, That the State board of equalization shall determine the value of all property of railroad, express, sleeping-car, telegraph, telephone, and other transportation or transmission companies, used by such companies in the operation of their railroad, express, sleeping-car, telegraph, or telephone lines, or other transportation or transmission lines, and shall certify the value thereof as so determined to the county and municipal taxing authorities.

Sections 11 and 12 provide as follows:

SEC. 11. The legislature may exempt from taxation property of each head of a family to the amount of $200.

SEC. 12. Lands held in large tracts shall not be assessed for taxation at any lower value per acre than lands of the same character or quality and similarly situated held in smaller tracts. The plowing of land shall not be considered as adding value thereto for the purpose of taxation.

These are only a few of the elaborate provisions guarding against any discrimination in the matter of taxation.

Upon the whole, the careful and impartial student will find that this constitution of New Mexico is a better constitution, more restrictive of the rights and privileges of corporations, and more calculated to secure fair and free elections, than most of the State constitutions now in force. There is no urgent need for amendment in any particular and certainly no such urgent need as to require that the constitution shall be sent back to the people of New Mexico before the benefits of statehood shall be conferred upon them.

THE NEW MEXICO CONSTITUTION IN ITS PRESENT FORM IS NOT UNUSUALLY DIFFICULT OF AMENDMENT.

The excuse for disapproving of this constitution at the present time and thus deferring statehood is that the constitution ought to be sent back so that the people of New Mexico may vote for or against a provision making it more easily amendable hereafter than it would be should it go into effect in its present form. A little examination will show that it is as easily amended now as the constitutions of most of the States. The principal objection is that it requires a two-thirds vote in each house of the legislature to submit amendments for the vote of the people. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who opened the discussion this morning, was vociferous and almost violent in his denunciation. I am sorry that he has stepped out of the Chamber for a moment, for I wanted to call his attention to the much greater difficulty of amending the constitution of his own State of Texas.

Section 50 of the constitution of Texas, of 1869, provided that—

The legislature, whenever two-thirds of each house shall deem it necessary——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit a correction on that?

Mr. OLMSTED. I will yield to the gentleman, but he can not correct me, because I am reading from the official document which I now hold in my hand.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The constitution of 1869 was a Republican constitution. The constitution we are now living under, under which our present laws are made, was made in 1876 by the Democrats.

Mr. OLMSTED. The constitution of 1869, like that of 1876, was adopted by the people of Texas. I am going to read them both. The constitution of 1869 provided that—

SEC. 50. The legislature, whenever two-thirds of each house shall deem it necessary, may propose amendments to this constitution; which proposed amendments shall be duly published in the public prints of this State at least three months before the next general election of representatives, for the consideration of the people; and it shall be the duty of the several returning officers at the next general election which shall be thus holden, to open a poll for and make a return to the secretary of state of the names of all those voting for representatives who have voted on such proposed amendments; and if thereupon it shall appear that a majority of those voting upon the proposed amendments have voted in favor of such proposed amendments, and two-thirds of each house of the next legislature shall, after such election, ratify the same amendments by yeas and nays, they shall be valid to all intents and purposes as parts of this constitution: Provided, that the said proposed amendments shall, at each of the said sessions, have been read on three several days in each house.

You will note that it required a two-thirds vote in each house in two different legislatures.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was only seven years afterwards?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is there any presumption that if the people of New Mexico do not like their constitution they can do as Texas did?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that it will take three-fourths of the legislature to authorize the people to vote on the constitution of New Mexico. They have got to carry a majority of all the votes and a majority of half the counties.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the people want to do it, they can. They always find a way. It is for the people of New Mexico to determine this question and not for us. We have no right to legislate for them.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. But when the State of New Mexico has been so apportioned that the voice of the people will not be heard upon these things, then it is for us to give them an opportunity to get from under that constitution by some amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM. Has there been any fraud alleged or shown with reference to the adoption of the present constitution in New Mexico? If there has not been, then, in the absence of fraud, and if a majority of the people of that Territory have indorsed the present constitution, what right or what power have we to butt in?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. A great deal of fraud has been alleged. We did not feel, however, it was necessary to go into this, because the number of fraudulent votes alleged were not sufficient to change the result.

The reason that the people swallowed the constitution was their great desire for statehood, and, besides, they were misled by the statement, constantly asserted in the newspapers and by stump orators, that this constitution was easy of amendment and the people were deceived in that particular.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the people of New Mexico want statehood, and offer us a constitution that provides for a republican form of government, why should they not have it?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. And why should we not say to the people of New Mexico: "If you desire to go to the polls when you elect your State and county officers and members of the legislature and Representative in Congress, and at that time vote upon an amendment to your constitution, you may do so." Why should we not allow them to do it, and let them come in, regardless of the fact of whether they adopt that amendment or reject it? What objection can there be?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I think I should like to proceed.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. What objection can there be to permitting the people to vote upon that amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman's answer——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is entitled to the floor, declines to yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the gentleman will yield to me one-half a minute——

Mr. OLMSTED. One-half minute.

Mr. GRAHAM. The statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is, I think, entirely confusing. He proposes to force his views upon the people of New Mexico.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; not at all; the gentleman is mistaken about that. We simply propose to submit our views to the people, to be adopted or rejected, as they see fit.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, there was not a scintilla of evidence before the Committee on Territories of any fraud or attempted fraud in the adoption of this constitution; simply general statements that that country was corporation-ridden and gang-politician controlled.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There was a hearing before the Committee on the Territories in the Sixty-first Congress, in which there were numerous charges of fraud and a good deal of proof to that effect, but I will say that we did not deem it necessary or wise to go into that proposition.

Mr. ANDREWS. There were no charges in the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, but there were.

Mr. OLMSTED. There was no evidence submitted of any fraud. There were general charges, just as there always are.

Now, I have shown you that the Texas constitution of 1869 was, upon its face, much more difficult of amendment than this constitution of New Mexico; but they had no difficulty at all in amending it in 1876. The constitution of 1876, which my friend [Mr. STEPHENS of Texas] tells me is a Democratic constitution, in the very first line of article 17, provides that—

> The legislature at any biennial session, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elect of the house—

Just exactly what you have in the New Mexico constitution. Where is the difference? Why should the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] complain of this constitution of New Mexico? In his own State amendments to the constitution can be submitted to the people only once in two years, and then only upon the votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The difference between that and the Republican constitution of 1869——

Mr. OLMSTED. I am talking about the difference between the present constitution, the Democratic constitution of Texas, and that of New Mexico.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] had something to say along the same line. The constitution of his State provides, in article 13, that—

> Any amendment or amendments may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives; and if the same shall be agreed to by two-thirds of the members elected to each of the two houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon—and then in due time submitted for the vote of the people. In other words, Georgia has precisely the same two-thirds provision as is found in the New Mexico constitution.

Now I come to the constitution of Mississippi. My friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] talked about the constitution of his State in condemning this New Mexico amendment provision. Here is the constitution of his State, article 15, section 273:

> Whenever two-thirds of each house of the legislature shall deem any change, alteration, or amendment necessary to the constitution, such proposed change, alteration, or amendment shall be read and passed by a two-thirds vote of each house, respectively, on each day for three several days.

In other words, it is just three times as hard to amend the Mississippi constitution as it is to amend the New Mexico constitution. It is more easily amendable than the constitution of my own State of Pennsylvania, which requires that an amendment be approved by two successive legislatures before it can be submitted to the people.

Those people of New Mexico have sent us up a constitution which the President has approved, and to which there can be no serious objection. It is a good constitution. I contend that under the present provision for amendment there is no difficulty at all in securing any amendment which the people of New Mexico may desire and within a reasonable time. It is true that it requires a two-thirds vote in each house for the first two years, but at the expiration of that time a majority at any regular session may propose amendments. It is far more liberal than the provision contained in many States whose constitutions I have read, and more liberal than in at least 30 States of this Union to-day. Why, then, should this constitution not be approved? Why should it be sent back to them to amend? Why this delay? Why not approve the constitution at once, as provided in the resolution as originally offered by the gentleman from Virginia, and let them become a State at once?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like him to explain how there can be any delay if the resolution reported by the committee is adopted. How would it delay the admission of New Mexico one day?

Mr. OLMSTED. This resolution, in its amended form, requires the people of New Mexico to vote upon an amendment to their constitution, after which it provides that they shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States "in accordance with the terms of the enabling act." That would require an amendment to the constitution to be certified back to, and approved by, the President of the United States, and approved and acted on by Congress, or, if not acted on, to wait until the end of the next regular session. At all events, it bears that construction, and it would tend to the utmost confusion. I say that to turn down this constitution at this time will work inexplicable confusion and delay and uncertainty in the admission of that Territory as a State.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there can not be any delay, because if this resolution is adopted, or the one introduced by me on the first day of the session, the President has to certify that to the governor of New Mexico, and he is to order an election for the State and other officers, and the Territory could not become a State until after the election of those officers.

The vote upon this amendment takes place on the very day that the officers are elected. Whether the people reject or adopt it, they come into the Union. It is to be done on the day that the election of officers takes place, and they have to have that election before they can be admitted. These are the facts. Then how can the resolution as amended cause any delay in the admission of New Mexico as a State?

Mr. OLMSTED. They are to come into the Union in accordance with the terms of the enabling act. The constitution, as amended or without amendment, if voted on again, would have to be certified up here again to the President and to Congress for approval. If not approved, the people of New Mexico would have a set of State officers without being a State. What is the occasion for taking any chances of confusion or delay? They can amend the State constitution after being admitted more easily than almost any other State. For my part I do not think that a constitution ought to be easily amended. I do not think that a State ought to amend its constitution as easily and as often as a man may change his shirt. It is not the purpose of a State constitution to be a vehicle for State legislation through the medium of amendment. The constitution is the chart by which the ship may sail, but it does not lay down all the details for the construction and operation of the ship. It is the instrument which defines the government and distributes its powers, but it is not expected to be a whole code of legislation within itself, nor to be amended from year to year. It is not intended to be the vehicle of annual or biennial legislation. That is left for the legislature or for the people, if they adopt the initiative.

Much has been said during this debate upon the subject of "a republican form of government," as if the whole matter were to be determined by arriving at the proper definition of that term. I do not so consider it.

Section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence.

That section has no particular reference to new States nor to the admission of new States. It applies equally to all of the States, no matter when they were admitted. It applies to the original 13 States as well as to the newest State.

No one has yet been able to give a full, complete, and satisfactory definition of the term. One writer has said that, as the 13 original States were all taken into the Union without question as to their form of government, it must be presumed that when the Constitution referred to a republican form it must have had reference to the constitutions of some or all of those States.

Madison defined it briefly as "a representative democracy." There are those who hold that the initiative in lessening, if not entirely taking away, the powers and privileges of the Representative, affords something less than a representative form of government. But I do not think that we need dwell upon that proposition.

The provision for the admission of new States is found in section 3 of the same article of the Federal Constitution, and it declares very simply but very definitely that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." It is within the power of Congress to admit a State on sight, without consideration of its constitution at all, but leaving that to be made by the people after statehood has been conferred. We do not require that the proposed constitution of an intending State shall be submitted to the President and Congress merely that we may determine whether or not that constitution provides a republican form of government, but also that we may determine whether its proposed principles of government are such as to commend it for admission into our glorious family of States. It would be almost a fraud to submit to Congress one constitution or frame of government so satisfactory as to secure the passage of the necessary act of admission, and then after admission immediately amend it in many important particulars, so as to make it an entirely different constitution and one under which Congress might not have been willing to admit the Territory to statehood at all. Therefore it is desirable that a constitution so submitted for the purpose of securing statehood shall be somewhat permanent in character and not susceptible of immediate change. Indeed, it is not desirable that any State shall change its constitution too often. The oftener it is amended, or sought to be amended, the less reverence will be entertained for it by the people.

The constitution already adopted by New Mexico is a most excellent constitution, justly entitled to a certain degree of permanence. It is undoubtedly true that when a State has been admitted into the Union it has the same right as that possessed by any of the older States to change its constitution with or without the consent of Congress, but it is only fair to Congress, which admits it as a State, that the constitution submitted to it for the purpose of securing that admission and which has been approved by Congress at least shall have a fair trial before it is radically changed.

We require the submission of the constitution to us because in the exercise of the power to admit a new State we must exercise a very wise discretion. Before we admit a State we ought to be convinced of the worthiness of that State and its people to be admitted, and one test of such worthiness is the form of government under which they propose to live, or, at least, to commence their statehood existence.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. Have we any right, any legal right, to go into that question any further than to determine whether the proposed constitution provides for a republican form of government?

Mr. OLMSTED. Why, certainly, we have the right to consider it in every detail, to inform our judgment as to whether that State ought to be admitted.

Mr. GRAHAM. Have we any right to keep a State out for doing that which it would have the power to do after it came in—any legal or moral right?

Mr. OLMSTED. We have a legal right to keep it out. We have a right to keep it out for any legal or any moral reason or for no legal reason or moral reason. We are under no moral or legal obligation to admit any State.

Mr. GRAHAM. Would Congress have the moral right to permit one Territory to come into this Union with Mormonism as a recognized practice, and the moral right, at the same time, to deny another admission on the same ground?

Mr. OLMSTED. The question of moral right is one thing and the question of the constitutional power——

Mr. GRAHAM. But the gentleman mentioned moral rights.

Mr. OLMSTED (continuing). Is another matter.

Mr. GRAHAM. I ask the question because the gentleman mentioned the moral right.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think the gentleman himself first mentioned moral rights. Of course Porto Rico, with 10 times the population, and Hawaii might claim that they have just as good a moral right to be admitted to statehood as either of these Territories now applying.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, did he notice that there was presented to the House and to the Senate the other day a memorial from the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii insisting upon their right to be admitted as a State of the Union?

Mr. OLMSTED. There was such a petition, and it is the great ambition of the people of Porto Rico to be admitted to statehood, but we are not bound to admit them.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to distinguish between the right and the power. I concede we have the power to keep any Territory out of the Union, however well qualified it may be for statehood, but have we the moral right when any Territory otherwise qualified presents to us a charter or constitution which clearly provides for a republican form of government?

Mr. OLMSTED. I think we have a moral right to inform ourselves in any way we please as to the worthiness of the people applying to be admitted to statehood, and one of the tests would be the form of government under which they propose to live, whether republican or otherwise.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does that not imply the right to distinguish between applicants and to refuse one and admit another, both of which are equally qualified for admission?

Mr. OLMSTED. We have that absolute right, and nobody can deny it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman think we ought to exercise it?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is a question for us to consider.

Mr. GRAHAM. We have the right to do a wrong, in other words.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman pardon a suggestion right there which is raised by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] as to the difference between the moral right and the power? I assume that no one would contend that Congress had the moral right to keep the State of Illinois, for instance, if it were not now in the Union, out of the Union under present conditions, or to have kept the State of Oklahoma out of the Union with the population that she has now, only a few years ago, or to keep another part of the continental confines of the United States, the original territory, not including Alaska, out of the Union when she became sufficiently populated to ordinarily entitle her to admission as a State. We have the power, but we have no moral right to do it.

Mr. OLMSTED. We have the power, and it is not so much a question of right, moral or legal, as it is a question of discretion and judgment and wisdom whether we shall admit a particular State or not.

Now, I assume that my friend from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] agrees with me that as this constitution does provide a republican form of government and is in every respect a good constitution we ought to approve it and admit that State at once.

Mr. GRAHAM. Providing you at the same time admit every other applicant that stands on the same ground.

Mr. OLMSTED. Would you exclude one because somebody else is opposed to another?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not stand by and see two cases exactly alike discriminated between. I would say both or none.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then you would do two wrongs rather than that one should be done?

Mr. GRAHAM. That would be consistent, at least.

Mr. OLMSTED. Consistently wrong. Now, I have already said I do not think constitutions ought to be too easily amended. When a constitution is submitted to us as a basis of admission to statehood it ought, at least, to have some little degree of permanence, otherwise it might merely "keep the word of promise to the ear but break it to the hope." For two years only they must have two-thirds of the legislature, and after that a majority can amend with greater ease than almost any State in the Union.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. My friend from Pennsylvania is mistaken about that. In two years they can amend by a majority; then for eight years it takes two-thirds. Then at one session of the legislature a majority, and then for eight years it takes two-thirds, and so on.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, they can do what amending they want in two years. There is not any two-thirds after two years. It is a majority every time.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have read it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Let me read it to the gentleman:

Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislature at any regular session thereof, and if two-thirds of all members elected to each of the two houses, voting separately, shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon.

Then there is a provision that an amendment——

Mr. OLMSTED. Go on.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will read further:

Or any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed at the first regular session of the legislature held after the expiration of two years from the time this constitution goes into effect, or at the regular session of the legislature convening each eighth year thereafter, and if a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses, voting separately, at said sessions shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered in their respective journals with the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. OLMSTED. A majority.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. A majority.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is just exactly what I said.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. An amendment at the end of two years and then two-thirds for eight years and then eight years before a majority can again amend the constitution. I will say to the gentleman that no person from New Mexico who participated in making that constitution and who appeared before our committee took the position that he takes. They concede, and the Delegate [Mr. ANDREWS] here concedes, that the statement I make in reference to it is correct.

Mr. OLMSTED. At the end of two years the majority can change.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. For that one session of the legislature.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is enough.

I propose to vote for the approval of this constitution and the admission of New Mexico as a State. So far as Arizona is concerned——

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Before the gentleman passes further I would like to ask him a question, because he has discussed the constitution more fully, and to me more interestingly, than anybody who has spoken upon it. He says any change we make would be a disapproval of the constitution of New Mexico. In that I agree with him. That was the gentleman's statement?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I agree with him in that. Now, the constitutional convention of New Mexico fixed an erroneous boundary line between New Mexico and the State of Texas, and it was necessary for Congress to change the boundary line as fixed by the constitutional convention in accordance with the facts and acts of Congress and acts of the Legislature of Texas, and this change is made in this resolution. Does the gentleman think the change in the boundary line would be a disapproval of the constitution of New Mexico?

Mr. OLMSTED. If Congress changes the boundary line, it will not be a disapproval of the constitution.

ARIZONA.

I have not so carefully examined the constitution of Arizona, but I have examined it sufficiently to see that it is not, in all its details, so perfect and so complete a constitution as that of New Mexico. But I prefer to accept it, initiative, referendum, recall, and all, leaving it to the good judgment of those people to dispose of those questions afterwards as they see fit, except so far as relates to the recall of judges. My vote will never be cast for the approval of any constitution containing such a provision for the recall of judges. I can not say that I favor the recall as applied to any office, but if the people of Arizona want it I am not going to object. I am not going to say that, as applied to other offices, it would be obnoxious to a republican form of government. But as applied to the judicial office, as the Arizona constitution now stands it certainly would be destructive of those principles upon which our Government is founded, and would weaken and impair that great bulwark upon which all our liberties depend—a courageous, free, and independent judiciary.

The provision is that at any time after he shall have been six months in office 25 per cent of the voters may file a petition for the recall of a judge. He is allowed the poor privilege of resigning within five days, in which event an election is held to determine who shall fill the vacancy. If he shall not resign, the election is held anyway. His name is placed upon the ballot with that of the candidate, or candidates, to run against him, and whoever is elected gets the office. The petitioners may print upon the ballot 200 words showing the reasons for his recall, and the only defense which the judge is permitted to make against this humiliation and disgrace—the only hearing allowed him—is found in the contemptible provision that he may within the limits of 200 words give his reasons why the judicial ermine shall not be snatched from his shoulders.

The fathers of our country, the founders of our Government, provided with great care for the means of impeachment of public Federal officials, including the judiciary, and most or all of the States have similar provisions. They involve the making of specific charges and a trial in which the accused may meet his accusers face to face, produce his witnesses, and make his defense. Such a provision is found in the Arizona constitution, but this power of recall is an added feature. It denies to the judge the privilege allowed to the lowest and meanest criminal, who has a hearing and a fair trial before he is condemned. Here his defense is limited to 200 printed words.

I have known a most learned, upright, and just judge at one term of license court to incur the enmity of the liquor men because he did not grant all the licenses they desired, and at the same time the opposition of the Prohibitionists, because he did not refuse all license applications. Both sides would readily have signed for his recall. I have known a judge whose recall would have been almost certain because he signed and addressed to the board of pardons a letter recommending the commutation of a death sentence to imprisonment for life.

We have been told during this debate of a mayor who was recalled, the real reason being that he had refused to permit a prize fight to take place. If out in that country the corporations and gang politicians are so all-powerful, as we are told, it would be absolutely unsafe for a judge to render a decision contrary to their interests. He would be subject to the humiliation of a petition for recall and plunged into a campaign for reelection, unless he should resign within five days.

Think of it! He is humiliated and disgraced, and subjected to impeachment practically. Is he given the right to appear with his witnesses? No. Is he given the right to face the witnesses of his accusers? No. Is he given a hearing? No. He is given only the privilege of stating in 200 printed words on the ballot his "justification of his course in office." He is not allowed the privilege that would be given to the lowest and vilest criminal in the land.

My vote shall never be cast in favor of a proposition to set the judicial boat afloat upon the sea of politics or to permit that a judge after six months in office may be put in a position where he must either resign or be plunged again into the political vortex to secure a reelection. This country is, and ever has been, blessed with judges not only learned and capable, but also pure and incorruptible and with absolute courage and independence to decide according to their honest convictions.

Mr. Chairman, from the day when the first judge of Israel received from the Ruler of the Universe the command: "Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor nor honor the person of the mighty, but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor" down to the present moment of time there has not been nor can there ever be any office within the power of man to confer upon man holding more of human interest than the office of judge. It represents the wisdom, the beneficence, the protection, the dignity, the awful majesty and the vast power of the law. It touches, or may touch, us in almost every relation of life—in our rights, our properties, our liberties, our reputations, or even our lives. Clothed as it is with such vast and varied responsibilities, duties, and powers, the requisite qualification for this high office include great legal learning, wide legal experience, quick and keen legal perception, a high order of executive ability, unwearying patience, unceasing industry, a warm and gentle heart, yet cold and stern impartiality, rigid honesty, great strength of character, and, above all, an overpowering determination to do equal and exact justice between man and man, without fear, favor, or hope of reward. Inscribed upon the corporate seal of the State Bar Association of the great Commonwealth from which I come is the motto, "Justice is the great interest of mankind on earth," and such should be the actuating, moving, guiding sentiment inscribed upon the heart and conscience of every judge.

Blackstone tells us that the "lucubrations of 20 years" are hardly sufficient to qualify a man for that great office. When we have found a man with all these qualifications, he may, after six months in office, if he render an unpopular decision, be recalled, disgraced, impeached, having been allowed the defense of 200 printed words in justification of his course in office. How could a man fit for the position be found to accept it under such conditions?

As defined by Socrates, the attributes of judgeship are "to hear courteously, answer wisely, consider soberly, decide impartially." Happily, we have in this country judges in whom those attributes are exemplified in the highest degree. We have all seen many instances where courageous judges have rendered just decrees in the face of great popular opposition. We have seen the judges of the supreme court of Kentucky render an opinion commanding a new trial in that most sensational case wherein a Member of this present Congress was a party, and when those judges knew that the State was worked up to a white heat about the matter and that their decision would render them, temporarily, at least, exceedingly unpopular. We have all seen within the past few days nine justices of the Supreme Court of the United States unite in a decree rending, tearing apart, and dissolving one of the greatest and most powerful corporations the world has ever known.

No judge shall ever by my vote be placed in a position where, in order to save himself from humiliation and disgrace, he must trim his sail to every political or popular breeze that blows, or consider the wishes of corporate managers or political bosses, or in rendering his decision take into consideration the probable effect upon his own position.

When the Arizona constitution is amended in that one particular I shall vote for its approval. But let us leave each judge in a position where, without injury or embarrassment to himself, he may render equal and exact justice according to his understanding, and with the firm step of conscious strength go forward, unmoved by public clamor, without reference to any possible effect upon his own reputation or popularity, absolutely free to > Poise the cause in justice's equal scale,

> Whose beam stands sure.

[Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRE].

Mr. DUPRE. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I desire to thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], who controls the time of the majority, for allowing me, with the fine courtesy that belongs to him as a son of the Old Dominion, an opportunity to participate in this discussion. In the second place, I desire to assure the committee that I shall not inject the American farmer into this debate. I have no doubt that he, in common with every good citizen, is intensely interested in the proper disposition of the pending resolution, and I am quite sure that there are eloquent and ingenious statesmen on both sides of this Chamber who, given the opportunity, would and could prove conclusively that his whole future welfare is dependent on the passage or defeat of this measure. I shall eliminate the farmer, however, from no feeling of hostility or indifference, but, on the contrary, from a feeling of friendship for and sympathy with him; for I believe that since the 4th of April last he has been worked "overtime" in this House and that he is entitled to a rest—if not a rest, at least an opportunity to pursue his avocation undisturbed by the "applause," the "loud applause," and the "loud and prolonged applause" that have greeted every allusion to him on this floor. If he lives in far-away Dakota, where the snow is beginning to melt—it was falling yesterday in Wyoming—give him a chance to sow his fields. If by good fortune he lives in Louisiana, where he can raise four crops a year, give him a chance to reap his harvest and to plant another crop. [Applause.]

Certainly the farmer can not justly complain that he has been neglected or overlooked in this extra session, for the RECORD teems with praises of him; of his patriotism; of his industry; his energy; his pluck; his progressiveness; with exultant joy at his prosperity, and tearful lamentation at his adversity. Always he has held the center of the stage, with light of every hue known to the spectrum playing artistically and effectively on his sturdy form and noble brow.

The majority and the minority are equally his friends. Leaders and followers, veterans and recruits, standpatters and insurgents, gentlemen from every section, of every style of oratory, of every degree of personal pulchritude, and of every sartorial taste, have testified to their affection for him and their tender solicitude for his welfare. The gentleman from Birmingham [Mr. UNDERWOOD] loves him no less than the gentleman from that lesser Birmingham, Pittsburg [Mr. DALZELL]. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], though he would sell him his lumber at the highest possible price, thinks as much of him as does my silver-tongued and silver-haired friend from the Cotton Belt, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. That king of globe trotters, with the inevitable diary in hand, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], is no more his friend than is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], who prefers the beauties of the Tombigbee to the castled banks of the Rhine. [Laughter and applause.] It would be as hard to decide who has the farmer's interests most at heart—whether the Sage of Danville [Mr. CANNON] or the Giant from Marion [Mr. JAMES]—as it was to decide the memorable debate at the Press Club the other night on the relative merits and demerits of hirsute ornamentation. The Apostle of Precedents, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], in his philosophic tribute to "The Man with the Hoe," was not less solicitous than the poet-statesman from California [Mr. KENT], who made "Dunc" McKinlay famous by defeating him. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who lives so near Saskatchewan that he can see the frolicsome sheep play hide and seek across the Canadian border, has no advantage in his love for the farmer over the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who, from his Beaumont home, can hear the turbulent roar of the Mexic Sea. By such as these has the farmer been glorified within the past month, and by a host of others, including the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], whose quondam incisiveness and blithe spontaneity and "near" omniscience are not so conspicuous now as in the good old days when his desk was connected with the Speaker's chair by a wireless apparatus and he could always send or receive the danger signal—S. O. S. [Laughter.]

No, the farmer has not been forgotten. Rather let us pray that, under such a shower of oratorical affection, he will not grow cynical and begin to wonder if we are all sincere. Let us hope that the farmer's daughter, now a student at Vassar or Smith or Newcomb, as a result of and because of Republican legislation, may not suggest to her fond parent the familiar Shakespearean line, "Methinks the lady doth protest too much."

Let us trust that the same farmer's son, driven from the ancestral farm as a result of and because of the same Republican legislation, and now a refugee in some great urban center of wickedness and depravity, may not quote to his revered sire the immortal words of Chimmie Fadden, with apologies to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND], "Dad, I t'ink de 'hole bunch is stringin' yer." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, having thus far strictly adhered to my promise not to embroil the American farmer in this discussion, I address myself to the pending measure. It undertakes to admit two worthy postulants to membership in our sisterhood of States. They have served a long and strenuous novitiate. More than once have they asked to take their final vows. Always objection has come; oftenest when the future seemed serenest. I fear, Mr. Chairman, that they have largely been the football of politics, but at last both the Democratic and Republican Parties have risen to a loftier appreciation of duty and, discarding all political advantage, have by their last platforms bound their followers to immediate admission into the Union of Arizona and New Mexico. The Democratic platform of 1908 says:

> The national Democratic Party has for the last 16 years labored for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States of the Union, and recognizing that each possesses every qualification successfully to maintain separate State governments, we favor the immediate admission of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as separate States of the Union.

The Republican platform of 1908 reads as follows:

> We favor the immediate admission of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as separate States in the Union.

The Democratic platform is the more consistent, as since 1892, and every four years thereafter, it has been favoring the immediate and separate admission of these Territories as States, the platform of 1892 declaring as follows:

> We approve the action of the present House of Representatives in passing bills for the admission into the Union as States of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

For a while the Republican Party sought to force their admission as one State. Its then leader, President Roosevelt, in his message of December, 1905, to the Fifty-ninth Congress urged that—

New Mexico and Arizona be admitted as one State. There is no obligation upon us to treat territorial subdivisions, which are matters of convenience only, as binding us on the question of admission to statehood.

But when legislation in accordance with his recommendation was enacted, the Territories refused to enter as Siamese twins, a proposition to that effect having been rejected by a vote of the people. The same Chief Executive in 1908, in accordance with his party's platform and in view of the express will of the people of the Territories, then made this recommendation to the Sixtieth Congress:

I advocate the immediate admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States. This should be done at the present session of Congress. The people of the two Territories have made it evident by their votes that they will not come in as one State. The only alternative is to admit them as two, and I trust that this will be done without delay.

In his message to the first regular session of the Sixty-first Congress, President Taft in December, 1909, used the following language:

The successful party in the last election in its national platform declared in favor of the admission as separate States of New Mexico and Arizona, and I recommend that legislation appropriate to this end be adopted.

But he added the following:

I urge, however, that care be exercised in the preparation of the legislation affecting each Territory to secure deliberation in the selection of persons as members of the convention to draft a constitution for the incoming State, and I earnestly advise that such constitution after adoption by the convention shall be submitted to the people of the Territory for their approval at an election in which the sole issue shall be the merits of the proposed constitution, and if the constitution is defeated by popular vote means shall be provided in the enabling act for a new convention and the drafting of a new constitution.

Thereafter a bill was passed on June 20, 1910, carrying his views into effect, the said bill being in truth "an enabling act," wherein the admission of the States separately was made dependent on their framing constitutions which conformed to the restrictions of the enabling act, and must be ratified by popular vote and thereafter receive the approval of the President and Congress. The exact provision of the law in so far as action by Congress and the President is required reads as follows:

If Congress and the President approve said constitution and the said separate provisions thereof, or if the President approves the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then and in that event the President shall certify said facts to the governor, who shall within 30 days after the receipt of said notification from the President of the United States issue his proclamation for the election of the State and county officers, the members of the State legislature, and Representatives in Congress, and all other officers provided for in said constitution, all as hereinafter provided, etc.

The provision is exactly the same for both Territories.

The constitutions were duly framed and ratified by the people, and the President, on February 24, 1911, advised Congress that he had approved the constitution of New Mexico. A resolution giving the approval of Congress passed this House at its last session, but failed in the Senate. No message emanated from the President with regard to Arizona and no resolution of approval was submitted to either House of Congress in so far as I know; the explanation being that the necessary certificate from the governor, chief justice, and secretary of state was not received in time, or, if received, was not in due form. It is generally understood, however, that the President will not give his approval to the constitution of Arizona, as one of its provisions is repugnant to him.

The present resolution undertakes to give the formal approval of Congress to the admission of both States, substantially under the constitutions framed and ratified by their electorate. It comes from the Committee on the Territories, reported by substitute, which provides that the people of Arizona and New Mexico shall vote on certain additional propositions the effect of which will be to give them an opportunity to reiterate or repudiate certain clauses in their proposed constitutions.

I shall not discuss the amendments proposed in the substitute resolution, as they are immaterial from my viewpoint of this question. The naked proposition, as I see it, is, Shall we, or shall we not, admit Arizona and New Mexico into the Union? Both parties favor such action. The people of the Territories are clamoring, even pleading, for it. That they are satisfied with their organic laws is shown by the fact that the constitution of New Mexico was ratified by a vote of 31,742 to 13,999, a majority of 17,743 votes; that of Arizona was approved by a vote of 12,186 to 3,822, a majority of 8,364. The size and extent of the Territories, the number of their inhabitants, the character of the people and their fitness for statehood all measure up to the criterion heretofore established for the admission of other Territories to statehood.

Indeed, all such preliminary questions are concluded, are put beyond the pale of present discussion by the passage of the enabling act in June last, which recognized the fitness of these States for admission. The only test now to be applied is that requirement to be found in section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

I have read with care the constitutions of Arizona and New Mexico, and in my judgment they, when put into operation, will ordain within the borders of those future States a republican form of government, no matter whether the suggested amendments to these constitutions are adopted or rejected.

In so far as that of New Mexico is concerned, a former Ohio judge, a former Solicitor General of the United States, and an ex-judge of the United States circuit court, whose high professional attainments men without regard to party gladly recognize—William Howard Taft—is of opinion, as shown by his executive approval of February last, that under its constitution a republican form of government will be guaranteed to its people. As far as the constitution of Arizona is concerned, no man can doubt that it, too, guarantees a republican form of government, who reads the illuminating argument of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], delivered in the Senate of the United States on the 17th of last April. He establishes the proposition by an historical analysis of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, by a philosophic review of the origin and development of republican government in this country, and by numerous and convincing references to judicial decisions by the courts of a number of States as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States. As I read his speech, I was glad to think of him as a typical American, born in the State of Mississippi, educated in the State of Virginia at the great university immortalized by the names of Washington and Lee, and now representing the State of Oregon in the Senate of the United States, where he stands for the best thought and highest ideals of the Great Northwest.

While time does not permit me to dissect them or refer to them in extenso on this occasion, as I said before, I think that both constitutions are constitutional. I am, however, free to say that neither meets my ideal of a State constitution. There are from my standpoint grave imperfections in both.

For that matter, so are there in the constitution of my own State of Louisiana, which I have sworn to protect and uphold. That of New Mexico is too hidebound, too inelastic. It reeks with cunningly devised schemes to prevent amendment or change. Its provisions with regard to corporate control are transparently nugatory, palpably in the interest of corporations, in spite of the ingenious explanations of these provisions given at the committee hearing by their author, Judge Fall. As one reads the constitution it is easy to see how a Delegate from New Mexico, in the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses, could with ease develop into a Republican Senator from West Virginia. The spirit of the constitution is, in a word, reactionary, out of touch with present-day ideas, and out of line with the enlightened thought of the best men in all parties and in no party.

The constitution of Arizona is too radical. It contains many provisions with which I am not in sympathy, but in spite of its circumstantiality of details, its crudities, its excesses, and its shortcomings, it errs in the right direction. If I had to cast my lot in either one of these new States, and had to live under either of these projected constitutions, I for one would prefer to intrust my life, liberty, and happiness to the organic law of Arizona rather than to that of New Mexico, and I make so bold as to say that a better and more American civilization will develop more quickly in Arizona than in New Mexico, unless the people of the latter State soon cast off the shackles which they, in their almost pathetic eagerness to enter this Union, have suffered to be imposed on them.

Among other provisions occurring in the Arizona constitution is one recognizing and making operative the initiative, referendum, and recall. I take occasion to say that I do not favor any one of those provisions, and I do not believe that they really make for the best interests of any State or of our country as a whole. I see no need of the initiative. There is no law that the people, if a majority of them really want it, can not secure through the present ordinary channels of legislation. Certainly their Representatives are not slow in suggesting or initiating laws for them. In the Sixty-first Congress some 45,000 bills were introduced in the two Houses, one bill for each 2,000 of our people. In this extra session, barely a month old, more than 12,000 bills have been dropped in the respective hoppers. They are bills of every character and description and represent every imaginable theory of legislative relief, including the abolition of the United States Senate.

If the people want any of these bills passed, will it be questioned that their passage can be accomplished without resort to the initiative? Just here, I may say that I for one agree with the Attorney General in the view expressed by him in his recent Princeton speech, that what the people want is not more laws but more efficient enforcement of existing laws. The situation calls more for men than for measures. [Applause.] But because I do not happen to believe in the initiative is no reason why I should call it unrepublican, when it has never been so held by any court, though it exists in Oregon, Oklahoma, Missouri, Arkansas, and other States.

In the same way I see no need for the referendum. As the people can now compel their Representatives to adopt such legislation as they desire, so can they compel them to repeal or modify existing laws when they find them unjust or unsatisfactory. Is there a better evidence of this reserve power in the hands of the people than that public opinion forced a Republican President to call an extra session in 1909 to revise the tariff, and that when the law enacted at that session was practically subjected to a referendum in November, 1910, the people refused to validate the action of their faithless Representatives and repudiated the Payne-Aldrich law in unmistakable tones. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Less than six months thereafter we find the Representatives of the people, through the Democratic majority, responding to the views expressed at the recent referendum and taking steps to initiate and enact legislation in accordance therewith. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I say that there is no real need to incorporate the referendum in a State constitution, and yet I am sure that such a clause does not conflict with a republican form of government within the meaning of the constitutional guaranty.

If the people of Arizona want it in their organic law, I for one, say, let them have it. Let them try it, and if experience demonstrates its unwisdom, they, unlike New Mexico, have left themselves foot-loose and can eliminate it.

I do not favor, because I see no necessity therefor, the insertion of an express recall provision in our scheme of Government. It is there already—an unwritten law, if you please—but one that the people have an unpleasant way of invoking.

For instance, when I came to this House in December last there were approximately 219 Republican Members. To-day the Republicans have dwindled to 160—some 59 of these patriotic gentlemen having been "recalled" by unappreciative constituencies. Is there a more perfect proof of the actual, if latent, existence of the power of recall under our Government than the spectacle of the picturesque gentleman from Illinois, who for eight years occupied the Speaker's rostrum until the 4th of March last, now recalled from that high elevation to a modest seat in the Fifth Row Back? [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And so I say that the underlying idea of the recall and its practical operation are actualities with us to-day. But I would not favor its crystallization in any statute or any extension of it by express law. As a rule, terms of office are short—distressingly so for the occupants of seats in this House—and the people can easily await the expiration of these terms "to turn the rascals out" without suffering serious damage to themselves or to our institutions. A provision that puts the officeholder at the weekly, monthly, semiannual, or annual mercy of a people's recall can not, in my conception of things, make for the stability of our Government nor for the courage or greater honesty of those charged with the enactment or enforcement of the law.

But, after all, it is the people who make the law, who create the office, who define its term, who choose its incumbent. Why, then, from a legal standpoint, can not they elect the official subject to such limitation as to his tenure as they may have previously imposed? Why can not they say, "We will give you a two-year tenure of office, but if you do not measure up to its responsibilities and do not satisfactorily discharge its duties, we reserve the right to turn you out even before the expiration of your term—whenever a majority so decides"? Is there anything antagonistic to a republican form of government in such a reservation of power in the people? If there is, I can not see wherein it lies.

But it is objected that the recall provision in the Arizona constitution will extend even to the judiciary. So it will, but what of it from the angle of whether there is to be a republican form of government in Arizona under its proposed constitution? Is there any difference between the judiciary and the other officers of the Government in the last analysis? Are not judges themselves subject to the supreme control of the people who instituted this Government and who ordained a judiciary to dispense justice therein? Can not the proper authority make the judiciary elective or appointive, extend or reduce their jurisdiction, increase or diminish the emoluments of their offices, and exercise other attributes of creatorship? Why, from the constitutional standpoint, is it permissible to make a governor of Arizona subject to recall but illegal to make the same apply to a judge?

I am a humble follower of the law. For 15 years I have practiced the profession, with the usual average of success and failure. When the day comes—may it be remote—and the people of my district, with the ingratitude with which republics have been accused, retire me from their service, I expect to resume its practice. I love the ideals of the profession; I honor its great names, whether of the past or of the present; I revere its noble exponents on and off the bench, but I never have been one to believe that any "divinity doth hedge" a judge. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are good and learned judges as there are good and worthy lawmakers. The percentage of good over bad, I am proud to say, is overwhelmingly predominant; but there have been, are, and will be corrupt judges as well as legislators and the one should be made to feel as well as the other the scorn and contempt of his associates and the damning judgment of his fellow citizens.

In my own State of Louisiana the entire judiciary is elective for varying terms of 4, 8, and 12 years. They are subject to impeachment and removal in differing modes: Judges of the supreme court by trial before the senate on charges preferred by the house; judges of the court of appeals and of the district court, among other ways, by a suit of the attorney general or a district attorney, on written request or information of 25 taxpayers of the circuit or district over which the judge presides, subject to appeal to the supreme court. For any reasonable cause, whether sufficient or not for impeachment, the governor is required to remove any judge on the address of two-thirds of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly. Louisiana is not, and never has been regarded as radical in its ideas or laws, yet these are the provisions in its organic law for the recall of unworthy judges.

I have no doubt that other States contain similar or more advanced provisions along these lines. The members of the profession themselves are constantly invoking the substantial idea of the recall as to judges when in their bar associations they protest against the renomination or reelection of a judge who has proven false to his trust. In the light of such provisions as I have quoted, and of such instances as I have cited, ought you or I or the Chief Executive deny statehood to Arizona because that State goes a step further and puts the power of recall of judges in the hands of the people and permits them to effect such recall before the term of the judge has expired?

Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in my appreciation of the value—indeed, necessity—of an independent and fearless judiciary. I know how much the permanency of our institutions owes to the great jurists of the past. I know how dependent, especially in this time of upheaval and unrest, our future is on the inculcation of a spirit of respect for law and order and of unquestioning obedience by the people to the decisions of the courts. But I know, too, that coequal in importance with this principle, indeed paramount to it, is the duty of upholding the right of self-government, the right of a community to make rules for its guidance as long as these rules do not conflict with superior authority. [Applause.] I would not by my vote insert the right of recall of a judge in the constitution of Louisiana; but believing, as I do, that the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit a Territory desiring to become a State from incorporating such a provision in its organic law, I will not by my vote prevent the admission to statehood of a Territory that desires such a provision in its constitution. I will not by my vote nullify, because of my personal ideas and convictions, the expressed will of more than two-thirds of those who voted to ratify a constitution containing such a provision. I shall support the committee's amendments, because they may more effectively secure the passage of this measure, but with or without them I am ready to vote for the immediate admission of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico into this Union of States. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this question has been going on for a week. The mercury has climbed to nearly 100 in the shade. About everything that can possibly be said on the subject has been said; many eloquent speeches have been made; and under these circumstances, late Saturday afternoon, it is somewhat of an embarrassment to attempt to discuss the matter even briefly. Had it not been for some things which have been brought out during the debate, I should not have entered into the discussion at this time.

On the 24th of last February the President of the United States communicated with Congress in the form of a message, in which he transmitted the proposed constitution of the State of New Mexico and informed us that he had approved the same. On the first day of March following, this House, without division or dissenting vote, approved that constitution. At that time the proposed constitution of the State of Arizona had not reached the Capitol, but it arrived here later, and at the beginning of this session the Committee on Territories very properly took up the consideration of the question of the approval of the proposed constitutions of these two States.

The result of their labors is before us in the resolution now under consideration, in which it is proposed to admit both Territories, but submit to the people of each for their consideration at the time of their first State elections certain proposed amendments to their respective constitutions. The amendment which the people of New Mexico are required to vote upon relates to that portion of their constitution which provides for amendments to that instrument. The proposition presented to the people of Arizona is an opportunity to eliminate from their constitution, if they see fit to do so, the provision for the recall of judges. Both these propositions are in the nature of referendums, and both Territories are to be admitted as States without regard to how their people vote on the propositions presented.

The objection to the constitution of New Mexico, as stated by the majority of the committee, is that its provisions for amendment are such as to make amendment difficult, and all sorts of sinister and unworthy motives are attributed to those who are responsible for that provision. In this condition of affairs it is pertinent to inquire what has occurred since the 1st of March last which has so radically altered the view of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle touching the proposed constitution of New Mexico. At that time, from anything I have heard to the contrary, that constitution was held to be a most excellent instrument, one under which that new Commonwealth could very properly be admitted into the Union. What has come over the spirit of the dreams of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber?

Since that time there has been some criticism of a certain provision in the constitution of Arizona, and I am of the opinion, as I believe many others are, that if it were not for the criticisms that have been made of the provisions of the Arizona constitution touching the recall of judges we never would have heard the philippics hurled from the other side of the aisle against the proposed constitution of New Mexico. But Arizona's constitution has been criticized in one particular, and having been attacked it became necessary for the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle to present a New Mexico Roland for the Arizona Oliver, and so for a week we have heard the Chamber reverberate with most fervid denunciations of this awful instrument, this reactionary constitution of New Mexico, which on the 1st day of March last, according to the vote of the House, was an altogether lovely and proper instrument.

Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are much disturbed in regard to this constitution, as to many of its provisions. I have not the time to go over those provisions. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], who preceded me, referred to some of them at length; but having read that constitution with considerable care, it strikes me as being one of the best under which a State has ever proposed to become of the sisterhood of States.

Gentlemen on the other side are particularly disturbed with regard to the provision of the constitution relative to amendment—that is, the provision with regard to amendments to most of the provisions of the constitution. What are those provisions? First, that the legislature shall by two-thirds vote propose amendments. I think 22 of the States of the Union have a similar provision, and some 6 or 7 States of the Union require three-fifths, so that more than a majority of the States of the Union have practically this same provision with regard to the initiation of constitutional amendments. When it comes to the ratification of a constitutional amendment the constitution provides that it shall be by an affirmative majority of the votes cast on the amendment, providing that majority is not less than 40 per cent of all the votes cast, and in half of the counties, and this is the provision that the gentlemen on the other side are particularly disturbed over, forgetful that about a third of the States of the Union have provisions with regard to the ratification of constitutional amendments which render such ratification much more difficult than this provision of the New Mexico constitution. I think there are some eight or nine States which require a majority of all of the votes cast at an election for the ratification of a constitutional amendment, whereas the proposed constitution of New Mexico requires only 40 per cent of all the votes cast.

The constitutions of Iowa and Georgia require for the ratification of a constitutional amendment the affirmative vote of a majority of those qualified to vote for members of the general assembly, which, I assume, means an affirmative vote of a majority of all those registered. No one can deny that these provisions of the constitutions of States of the Union render the amendment of their constitutions much more difficult than the provision of the constitution of New Mexico referred to renders that constitution, and yet against this provision the gentlemen on the other side have thundered, with more eloquence than logic, for a week.

It seems to me it is highly important that the States shall have such constitutional provisions that the fundamental laws can not be amended by a minority vote. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] opened the debate on this resolution, and I am reminded of the fact that in his State, under a provision by which a constitutional amendment may be adopted by a majority of the votes cast on the question, an important constitutional amendment was adopted several years ago by an affirmative vote of less than 7 per cent of the electors of the State.

The resolution before us which the Democratic majority ask us to support proposes to call upon the people of New Mexico to vote on the question as to whether they shall modify their constitutional provision with regard to general amendments, so that an amendment may be proposed by a bare majority of the legislature and ratified by a bare majority of those who vote on the question. Those who have given any attention to that sort of thing know that in the presence of a noisy, clamorous, and insistent demand, even though it be backed by an infinitesimal minority of the people, a legislature may finally be worn out and working along the line of least resistance prevailed upon to present an amendment for the ratification of the people which a majority of the members do not approve. We also know that it has frequently occurred that amendments thus presented have been adopted, as in the case of the amendment I have referred to in Colorado, by a small minority of the people. Of course, it can be argued that if the proposed amendment is really seriously objectionable the people will take the trouble to vote against it, but this does not necessarily follow. The indifference that often characterizes a vote on a constitutional amendment is quite as likely to arise from the fact that the evils that may lurk in the amendment are not appreciated as from the fact that the amendment is considered innocuous. Certainly there is no crying need for an amendment to the fundamental law of any State the necessity for which is not realized by a majority of those who vote at an election.

Personally I am inclined to favor the Iowa and Georgia provisions, which require that a majority of all those qualified to vote shall give their assent to a constitutional amendment before it shall become part of the organic law. This is but a logical application of the rule of majorities, and those who insist upon what they are pleased to call more liberal provisions with regard to amendments are clamoring not for the rights of the people but for the opportunity of active and possibly ill-advised minorities to write their views into the organic law.

But if the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle were consistent in their demand for the liberalization of the amendment provisions it would be an entirely different matter, but consistency, which is a jewel, shineth not in this report or in the resolution now before us. There are objectionable features in the constitution of New Mexico touching the amendment of four of the articles of the constitution, and this same majority which is so fearful that the people of New Mexico shall not have a right by a minority vote to repeal the bill of rights still leaves the matter of amendment of these articles in such form that if the people of New Mexico want to grant the franchise to women, the better half of mankind, if they want to do away with the teaching of alien language in all the schools of the Commonwealth, they must have the vote of three-fourths of the legislature, three-fourths of the voters, and two-thirds of the electors in every county of the State. And that is the sort of consistency we find in the proposition before us.

If the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are honest and sincere in their demand that constitutions shall be easily amended, why do they not demand an amendment so that the franchise may be granted to women; that the teaching of Spanish in the schools may some day be dispensed with, and thus a dual civilization and language pass away, without compliance, with requirements which are practically prohibitory?

Article 7, section 1, of the constitution of New Mexico relates to the qualification of electors; section 3 relates to the rights of citizenship; and section 10 of article 12 provides that the children of Spanish descent shall be granted equal privileges in the schools with other children and that separate schools shall not be established for them. For reasons which seemed good to them the people of New Mexico provided that, so far as these articles were concerned, the constitutional provision relative to amendments should be practically prohibitive.

And gentlemen on the other side, clamorous in their demand that the people of New Mexico shall have the right to amend their fundamental law, leave the provisions of amendment of these sections just as written by the people of New Mexico. Ah, more than that! The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] the other day, when I called his attention to the matter, said, "Well, we did not change that."

Well, that would not have been a very good answer if it had been entirely accurate, but unfortunately it was not entirely accurate. Section 8 of article 12 of the constitution provides for the training of teachers in Spanish in order that the Spanish language may be forever taught in the schools of New Mexico, and thus an alien population permanently maintained there. The people of New Mexico were perfectly content with the provision in their constitution to the effect that an amendment proposed to change this section should only be submitted upon the vote of three-fourths of the legislature, but they were perfectly willing to leave the ratification of that question to the people on the general proposition of ratification of 40 per cent of the electors in half of the counties. But the gentlemen on the other side, claiming to be so anxious to liberalize this constitution, so anxious to give the people of New Mexico an opportunity to amend their constitution by a minority, have in the case of this particular section of article 12 made it much more difficult to amend in their proposed change than was provided in the constitution adopted.

And this is the consistent position which the gentlemen on the other side expect us to follow. If the constitution of New Mexico relative to amendments ought to be amended, it ought to be amended in toto. And yet in regard to those provisions which are practically prohibitive the gentlemen on the other side have either left them as they were, or, as in the case of the article that I have referred to, they have made it more prohibitive than it was before.

Well, I suppose there was some reason for this. In the first place, the Spanish-speaking people of New Mexico are not altogether unacquainted with what the Democratic Party has done to the colored brother in the South, and it would not have done for the Democratic Party to have changed those provisions intended to safeguard the rights of the Spanish-speaking people. Otherwise my friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] could not have made that impassioned appeal in his speech, which sounded like a stump speech to a meeting of his Spanish-speaking constituents, in which he assured them that the Democratic Party did not propose in any way to affect those guaranties which tend to maintain in New Mexico a dual citizenship.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is comparing the Spanish-speaking citizens of New Mexico and Arizona with the colored people of the South?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not making any comparison. The gentleman himself has made the comparison. I am simply suggesting—and that suggestion came to my mind from the speech of my eloquent friend from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], when he assured the Spanish-speaking constituents of his State, which borders on New Mexico, that while you as the majority of the House were demanding that a small percentage of the citizens of New Mexico should be given the opportunity to repeal the bill of rights, you were leaving unchanged those provisions that make it practically impossible for the people of New Mexico to dispense with the teaching of Spanish in the schools or further restrict voting or holding office on the ground of inability to speak the English language.

And it was very proper, under the circumstances, that my friend from Colorado, who has the largest Spanish-speaking constituency in the United States outside of New Mexico, should have opened the argument on that side of the Chamber.

I reminded the gentleman at the time that, coming as he did from a woman's-suffrage State and a State where the ladies had had the very good judgment to return him to Congress, it seemed to me that, so long as he was aiding in proposing to amend the constitution of New Mexico it would have been highly logical and proper to have so amended it as to make it possible for the people in New Mexico to grant the franchise to the most intelligent and to the "better half" of mankind. [Laughter.]

But evidently the Democratic Party, while anxious that the good people of New Mexico shall have the right by a minority vote to repeal all of the guarantees, civil and religious, contained in their constitution and adopt every fad and fancy that every change in the political wind may bring to them, does not propose to aid or assist in securing the franchise for women or to lose sight of the hope of electing a Democratic Senator down there by changing one iota a proposition which they fondly imagine appeals to the Spanish-speaking people of the proposed State.

Mr. Chairman, if the Committee on the Territories had simply examined these two constitutions for the purpose of determining whether or not they provided a government republican in form and in harmony with the enabling acts and had reported they had found them such, I should have voted to admit both Arizona and New Mexico into the Union under the constitutions they have adopted without any qualifications or provisions whatever.

I do not believe in the recall of judges. I think that Commonwealth is most unfortunate that shall adopt a provision of that kind. But I realize the right of an American Commonwealth to write into its organic law a provision of that kind, and if the duty of approving or disapproving it had not been presented to us directly, as it has been presented here, I should have been willing to have voted to accept both constitutions. But the gentlemen on the committee saw fit to accept the responsibility of proposing the approval of these constitutions with certain requirements. Their action, then, amounts to an approval of the constitutions after consideration of their provisions with a demand that the people go through the form of again passing on some of their provisions.

Now, we either are for or we are against the proposition of the recall of the judiciary. We have, by the action of a committee of this House, assumed the responsibility of saying whether or no, in our opinion, a provision of that kind should go into a State constitution by approval of Congress; and in that condition of affairs, it seems to me, our duty is perfectly clear, and that is to accept the constitution of New Mexico, a fair and reasonable and just constitution, except as to those particular provisions which the majority do not propose to change, and that, on the contrary, we should demand of the people of Arizona that if they are to receive the approval of the Congress of the United States for their constitution they shall take from it that provision that nine-tenths of the Members of this House believe ought not to be in it. I do not believe there are 10 per cent of the Members of this House who believe in the recall of the judiciary. I firmly believe that a great majority of Members on both sides of the Chamber believe it to be a very unwise and very dangerous provision. We have accepted responsibility, we have gone into the subject, we have laid down certain propositions. We shall not have done our duty until we shall have insisted that, so far as that dangerous provision is concerned, it shall be stricken from the constitution of the State.

In the 15 years that I have been here I have on numerous occasions labored for the admission of these two Territories. I opposed the joint admission of the two as one State, because I believed that the West and the Southwest were entitled to the influence that they will exert more potently as two than as one State. I did not believe that the people occupying that region would have the same influence in the American Congress and in the affairs of the American people as one State, without regard to representation in the Senate, that they will have as two; and so believing, I opposed the proposition of joining the two Territories in a single State.

They are now ready for admission. But one thing stands in the way, the striking from the constitution of Arizona of a provision which is profoundly dangerous. With this done, two more stars from the golden Southwest shall be added to the glorious flag of the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman, at the opening of this debate I had intended to take up the subject quite extensively; but since listening to the able discussions on both sides of this House I do not feel at this late hour that I need take up the time that I had intended to give to this matter, and for that reason I will be very brief in my remarks.

I have the honor to represent what is perhaps one of the most-talked-of Territories that ever asked for admission into the Union. After reading our constitution, some people have erred so far as to intimate that the people of Arizona are not capable of governing themselves. I wish to say that this is decidedly an erroneous conclusion, and I am going to show that, on the contrary, we have within the confines of the Territory of Arizona the highest type of citizenship of any State within this Union. I am going to make the logic of that claim clear to every one of you. [Applause.] Many of you are familiar with the nature of our citizenship, but for the benefit of those who have never studied the character of the genus Arizonan I will endeavor to make a character sketch of him.

The citizenship of Arizona is made up of people from every State in the Union and from almost every nation on earth. The man in the East who has moved to Arizona and started life anew has of necessity been a man of intelligence, enterprise, and courage. He is of the material of which pioneers are made—men bold and strong in body and courage. The United States has developed the strongest citizenship of any nation on earth, because she has drawn the strong spirits from all the nations of the world. She has displayed her charms to those who were bold enough to throw off the inertia of the ages and strike anew into the unexplored. These pioneers of Europe, the fittest of all her sons, have settled in the older communities of this country and bred sons and daughters. Then the West again began to call, to offer her attractions to those who were again bold enough, strong enough, and intelligent enough to conquer the difficulties that lay in the way of a second migration. Again were the strongest and the fittest taken west.

When these selected, active spirits reached Arizona they found that the country was full of men and women just like them. One man had come from New York, one from Iowa, one from Texas. Each man had brought the ideas of the section from which he came. Each tried out his ideas of farming or mining or cattle raising in the light of his earlier experience. Each compared notes with all his fellows. Each learned toleration. Each constantly broadened his horizon. The life of the West so proved itself a demonstration school of methods, a college for the pushing back of the mental horizon, a nursery for the sons and daughters of the sons and grandsons of selected pioneers.

So, Mr. Chairman, I say to you that the people of Arizona are the results of generations of the fittest men and women that the world has to offer. In no other community has a better opportunity been offered to build up the highest type of the dominant man. The result is the citizenship of Arizona as it exists to-day, which I claim is the highest type of citizenship on earth. The logic of the development of the Territory shows why this statement of mine should not be mere boast, but an actual fact.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert into the RECORD some figures from the census of 1910:

Mr. Chairman, shortly after I came to Congress I had the pleasure of meeting the late Senator Elkins one day. He had at one time represented the Territory of New Mexico as a Delegate in Congress. He said to me, after I had talked to him for a short time, that a Delegate representing a Territory is simply a political beggar. This I found to be very true. I have been begging ever since I have come to Congress for the admission of Arizona into the Union, and I am here to-day, gentlemen, in that capacity, begging the Democrats and the Republicans on both sides of this House to admit Arizona into the Union, and to do it now.

There has been some discussion on the floor of this House as to Arizona's political faith. I do not think that that question should be taken up here. We are not here asking as Democrats or as Republicans to come into the Union. We are here asking for admission for Arizona and all the people in it, for no clique, nor creed, nor party.

I am here representing the people of Arizona, not the Republican Party, not the Democratic Party, nor the Populist Party, nor any other particular party. I came to Congress as their Representative, and ever since my arrival I have worked in that capacity, and I believe that the Members of this House will bear me out in the statement that I have tried faithfully in every respect to do everything I could for the people whom I represent. [Applause.] I want to say, further, that I am proud to represent Arizona, and I hope that when I retire from Congress the people will have the respect for me which I have for them, and always will have.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I will say that we hope to see the gentleman go to the Senate of the United States just as soon as we admit Arizona. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say as to political faith that everybody knows I am a Republican. I am a Republican because I believe in the Republican doctrine, and I shall believe in it, I know, as long as I live, because I feel it has made and formed one of the greatest Nations that will ever exist. It is not an issue now to be considered who will represent Arizona in Congress after she has been admitted into the Union. I will say to you gentlemen on the other side of the House that if Arizona should elect, to represent her in the Halls of Congress, two Democratic Senators and one Democratic Representative, they will be good men, but if I can help it they will never come here as Democrats. I will do my utmost to see that two Republican Senators and one Republican Representative are sent. But, Mr. Chairman, those are questions which we will fight out at home. All we want now is to have the Members of this House give us an opportunity. Those who come after we are admitted will be capable and efficient men, and a credit to the new State and to the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, it is high time that Arizona be recognized in her efforts to gain a place in the sisterhood of States. I am here in an attempt to remove from her path the last of the obstacles that have for more than a score of years barred her citizens from the privileges that are extended to others of their kind living under the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. Chairman, your Committee on Territories has just reported a resolution for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico. There is a majority and a minority report. The majority report provides that Arizona be admitted and that, following admission, the matter of the recall of judges be voted upon by the people of the proposed State. In other words, it requires that the President shall approve of the constitution of Arizona without knowing whether or not it is to contain the clause that is so objectionable to him.

The minority report, however, takes a different view. It states that Arizona shall be admitted provided she strikes out the recall of judges at the election of her first State officers. It has the effect of virtually striking out the provision for the recall of judges, for Arizona has her choice of striking out this clause or keeping out of the Union. But it has the great advantage of being acceptable to the President. Mr. Taft will, I believe, sign the minority resolution.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know upon what authority the gentleman says the President will sign the minority resolution; and I suppose he means by that that he would not sign the majority resolution.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, I will state I have said Mr. Taft will, I believe, sign the minority resolution, and I feel that I have excellent reasons for holding that opinion.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Does not the gentleman believe he would sign the majority resolution?

Mr. CAMERON. I will say, if the gentleman will allow me, that I will take up those questions a little later.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, just one moment before the gentleman begins. I have understood, and it has been practically conceded on the floor of the House here, that the President would sign this majority resolution if it passed the House. Now, what information has the gentleman contrary to the rest of the statement that he would not sign it?

Mr. CAMERON. I will say to the gentleman from California that these are my personal convictions, and I am solely responsible for them.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman any information on the subject?

Mr. CAMERON. I am not at liberty to answer that question. I have the best of information upon which to base my opinion, and regret that I may not state just what that information is.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that the committee went to the President to see him?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, no.

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. Is it not a fact that the committee went to the President to see him about the matter?

Mr. CAMERON. I am only one of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the question. The question is, Did not this Committee on Territories send a delegation to the President in regard to these resolutions?

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I should not yield further to this questioning, as my time is limited in which to conclude my remarks.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman might understand that it is not customary in the House to narrate conversations between a committee and the President.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, what took place between the committee and the President was published in the newspapers, and that certainly there would be no impropriety to state what was so published.

Mr. MANN. We have no objection to the gentleman stating, if he desires to do so.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not want to interrupt the Delegate from Arizona until he desires to be interrupted.

Mr. MANN. Everyone knows that the President probably would not sign the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Did I understand you to make statement of your opinion on the subject and say it was based upon personal information?

Mr. MANN. I did not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not wish to pursue it further, if that is the case. I do not know any authority for the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that the President would not. I do not know what authority the gentleman has.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw it as to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] or anybody on that side of the House. I thought it was generally understood.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that "the gentleman from Tennessee" and other Members on this side of the House have had as much opportunity to know as the gentleman from Illinois has on this especial matter.

Mr. MANN. I am not questioning that. I am not questioning that wisdom resides on that side of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Several Members of this House have had some consultations and interviews on this subject, and have some knowledge, but we do not care, nor is it proper, to discuss what that knowledge is.

Mr. MANN. I think myself it is not proper to discuss conversations had with the President. I have no idea that the President would sign the joint resolution proposed by that side of the House if it ever should go to him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to say that I have some ideas on this subject, and they do not concur with the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have no idea the President would fail to sign the resolution reported here by this committee on account of its provision in reference to Arizona.

Mr. WILLIS. If I may be permitted to state, since this matter has come up for general expression of opinion—and I do not think it is proper to discuss in this committee personal conversations had with the President—but I give it to you as my opinion that I have not the slightest idea that the President of the United States, in view of the position he has taken before the country in the past, would sign the resolution reported by the majority of this committee. I want it understood that that is simply my opinion.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. With the gentleman's permission——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] yield?

Mr. CAMERON. I do.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The newspapers published the fact that a committee from the Committee on Territories, consisting of Mr. HOUSTON of Tennessee, Mr. LEGARE of South Carolina, Mr. GUERNSEY of Maine, and Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, paid the President a visit and consulted with him on this subject.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman, I had not any idea that I would precipitate a controversy over this matter. I am trying to make a short statement here of my own. I have not questioned any statement that has been made here during this debate of nearly a week's duration. I have not said one word as to whether these statements were right or wrong, but I now desire to make my position in the matter clear.

So, to get back to the original question, I would say that every indication is that Mr. Taft will not sign the majority resolution. We must have the signature of the President to become a State. We want to take the proper steps to get that signature.

If the minority report is adopted and the measure passes the House, there is every indication that it will pass the Senate also. If it passes the Senate, the President will sign it and the matter will be finally disposed of. If the majority report is adopted, it will meet opposition in the Senate. The bill will come back to this side of the Capitol for further action. If the House finally forced its majority report through the Senate, it would fail of approval by the President and we would be farther from the goal than ever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman, it is statehood we want instead of the disfranchisement we have so long suffered. It is definite action we want instead of legislation with a string to it.

It is now two years since President Taft's visit to Arizona. On that occasion he assured the Territory of his friendship and his desire that statehood should soon be granted. The platforms of both parties had declared in favor of statehood. There was apparently no obstacle in the way. In the Congress that followed, Arizona was for the first time in many years represented by a Republican. Congress was Republican. The administration was Republican.

The result of this combination of favorable conditions was that an enabling act was passed, and Arizona lacked only the framing of a suitable constitution to become a State. The President had told our people of the sort of constitution he would approve, and warned them against extremes. But a constitutional convention was called that was entirely dominated by Democrats, and these men framed the very constitution against which the President warned them. The result was that the Territory failed of admission at the last regular session of Congress. The result is that she is still on the outside looking in, while she should even now be holding her election for Senators, Representative, and State officers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I took the position with the people of Arizona that the right thing for them to do under the enabling act was to frame a constitution under which they might get statehood. Statehood has been the thing nearest the hearts of the people of Arizona for more than two decades. I therefore canvassed the Territory advising that the President's suggestions be followed. I have ever since warned the people whom I represent against extremes in their constitution, for the good and sufficient reason that I knew just what would happen to such a constitution when it came to the President for his signature. The merit or lack of it in the measures proposed has had nothing to do with the advice I gave. I merely pleaded for diplomacy and expediency.

I have known all the time that the President was intensely opposed to such measures as the recall of judges, and that he would refuse to sign a constitution that provided for it. I have insisted that the people of Arizona stand back of me in this matter. I believe they are back of me. There was a time when I was criticized for my stand, but the people have now found out that it is a question of giving over the recall of judges or giving over the hope of statehood, and it is statehood we want. The President very definitely stated his position in the matter in his address before the conference on the reform of criminal law in New York on May 13 last. He said:

> Not content with reducing the position of the judge to one something like that of the moderator in a religious assembly or the presiding officer of a political convention, the judge is to be made still less important and to be put still more on trial and to assume still more the character of a defendant. If his rulings and conduct in court do not suit a small percentage of the electors of his district, he may be compelled to submit the question of his continuance on the bench during the term for which he was elected to an election for recall, in which the reason for his recall is to be included in 200 words and his defense thereto to be equally brief.
> It can hardly be said, my friends, that this proposed change, if adopted, will give him greater authority or power for usefulness or constitute a reform in the enforcement of the criminal law of this country. Let us hope that the strong sense of humor of the American people, which has so often saved them from the dangers of demagoguery, will not be lacking in respect to this "nostrum."

Mr. Chairman, we who really want statehood and who are attempting in an intelligent way to get it want no more of this attempt to force this matter down the throat of the President. We want to take no more chances. We want to give no further opportunities to those trouble mongers who have already caused us so much embarrassment and have, in so doing, kept us out of statehood and are still endangering our chances. We want this minority report, which virtually cuts the objectionable part of the constitution out and leaves it clear sailing to ultimate passage and the signature of the President.

We want this minority report, because it seems sure of a smooth passage through Congress and sure of the signature of the President. The constitution as framed, even with the elimination of the recall of judges, is sufficiently liberal to please the Democrats and those members of the Republican Party who style themselves "progressives." The regular Republicans are going as far as they may well be expected to go when they accept the initiative, the referendum, and the recall of officials other than judges. There seems to me to be no occasion for insisting upon the retention of this one small thing in the constitution when that thing is almost certain to prevent that statehood for which we have so long fought.

Mr. Chairman, I have a wholesome respect for the judgment of the President of the United States. His performances and accomplishments since he came into office have been epoch making. I predict that the time will come when the passing of years has given events of the present the proper perspective, when history will write the name of William Howard Taft high in the annals of fame, when posterity will give him credit for many things that were in advance of his time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The steadying hand of the President has been felt in Arizona as elsewhere. Since the first indications were at hand, after the passing of the long Democratic domination in Arizona, that statehood was attainable the President's well-balanced mind laid down for the Territory the fundamental principles for a constitution. The President was right in his advice. But had he been wrong, it would have been the part of wisdom for the people of Arizona to have conformed to his wish, for statehood was impossible without the President's approval.

Long before the President made his positive denouncement of the recall of the judges there was no question of his stand in the matter. Attorney General Wickersham had been sent forth to declare the position of the administration on many occasions, and his utterances had been concise and to the point. At the annual banquet of the State Bar Association of New York, in January, Mr. Wickersham, in speaking of the constitutions of the newer States, said:

> What do you think; what will lawyers anywhere, thoughtful lawyers, think of a constitution which provides for the recall of judges by popular election if they render decisions which do not meet with popular applause? Yet that is the sort of thing which is now being advised by men who are seeking to found a Commonwealth on distrust in their fellow citizens. Neither the government of a State nor the government of a city nor the government of a nation can ever progress except in reliance upon the integrity of the greater mass of mankind. Unless every government is to be a failure and unless government of the people and for the people is to perish from the earth, such conceptions as these must receive the reproach of all the thoughtful, patriotic, law-abiding, trusting citizens of this great land.

Mr. Knox and other members of the President's Cabinet have been no less outspoken. It has been clearly obvious from the beginning that those alleged friends of Arizona who were attempting to force certain measures down the throat of the administration were in reality Arizona's worst enemies. Many of these men had the best intentions in the world. Some of them were merely self-exploiters. The results of the labors of all were the same—to embarrass Arizona.

Now we have this majority report which will further embarrass us in our hopes. The minority report will allow us to reach our goal with greater ease. We would therefore prefer that you remove for all time this troublesome appendix to our constitution and allow us to come into that health and vigor to which we are entitled.

Mr. Chairman, this desire for statehood has become a ruling passion with the people of Arizona. They want statehood as they want nothing else. So long has it been held out to them as a bauble to a child and then withdrawn that they have been driven almost to desperation.

Now, with a citizenship such as I have described to you, deprived of a voice in the government of which it is a part, controlled by governors, secretaries, and supreme court judges in whose selection it has no choice, doing business under that unstable form of government accorded to the Territories, you can well imagine the discontent.

These people want statehood. They are not interested in the splitting of hairs over some particular phase of some minor point in the constitution under which they are admitted. They have made that constitution easy of amendment; and if its provisions are not found to be satisfactory, they may be changed. The people of Arizona want to waive all this bother about small matters and get down to business. They want to be admitted into the Union now. [Applause.]

Therefore I ask you to adopt a resolution that will go through and give us statehood.

There is but one other thing in the mind of the people of Arizona. They have the ambition to become the best governed community on earth. The man of the West is not averse to trying experiments. He is not greatly bound by precedent. He believes in trying things out. If they prove the best things, he adopts them. If they prove unsatisfactory, they are rejected. So it is with Arizona. She wants to be the best-governed community on earth. She is trying some experiments in government. Her judgment as to their merits after trial may be relied upon. There need be no fear of the people of Arizona persevering in any mistake. If they are given the statehood to which they are entitled, the bigger sisters need never fear embarrassment on the part of the baby of them all.

So we want to rally the friends of statehood around this minority report and urge it through to final passage. We want, this fall, to hold an election for State officials and Members of Congress. We want to have a man on this side next winter who can not only speak in behalf of the good people of Arizona, but can vote in their interest. We want men on the Senate side to serve with equal purpose. We believe we know the best way of accomplishing this. We ask you, our friends, to join us and help us out in this final struggle for the goal of our ambition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska). The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this matter has taken a very wide range. Much of it was relevant, but a good deal of it is, I think, irrelevant. It seems to me that too many of the arguments made and too much of the discussion that we have listened to have been devoted to a comparison of the merits of different State constitutions, and are entirely beside the question. I do not think we have much, if anything, to do with the respective merits of the organic laws of the different States that have been admitted into the Union already. The question before us, as I understand it, is not what constitutional provisions are the best, but the simple question, Do the constitutions offered by these two applicants for admission to the Union provide for governments which are republican in form?

There are but two provisions in the Federal Constitution which relate to this matter. One of them is the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which provides that Congress may admit new States into the Union. The word "may" means, no doubt, that Congress has discretionary power in any particular case as to whether it will or will not admit the applicant, but surely it was expected to be a wise and honest discretion. The other constitutional provision and the one discussed so much here is, I think, the one we should devote most of our attention to, namely, that "the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government."

Now, I freely concede that under the first of those constitutional provisions Congress has the power to keep any applicant from coming into the Union; and, as developed in the colloquy between the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my friend Mr. OLMSTED, and myself, I concede that Congress has the power to keep an applicant out of the Union, even though Congress is wrong. Congress can arbitrarily exercise that power if it chooses, but I do not think it has the moral right to do it.

For example, a very bright little boy delivers the evening paper at my office. He is about 10 years old. I have the physical power on the slightest pretext, or no pretext at all, to thrash that boy. But, even if no law prevented, have I the moral right to do it? No one would claim that I have. In that same line Congress has the power to keep either one of these applicants or both of them out of the Union, but has it the right to do it? Has it the moral right to do it, even though it has the power, as I concede it has?

I listened with particular attention this afternoon, and with great interest, to the argument made by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I think, so far as the first branch of the case is concerned, his brief and argument absolutely covered every point that could be raised in regard to the question. I thank him for it. It is conclusive; and I was particularly pleased with it, because it covered vastly better than I could cover it my own line of thought on the subject.

I was reminded during the course of his argument of a historical incident with which you are all familiar. When Gen. Jackson was in New Orleans in 1813 he had occasion to proclaim martial law in that city, and, for reasons which seemed satisfactory to him, he placed Judge Hull under arrest there. Later on the judge got after the General and imposed a fine of $1,000 on him for his interference with the judicial branch of the Government. The fine was paid and retained for a long time. Many years afterwards a distinguished Senator from my State—a man not only of national but of international fame—offered a resolution in the Senate that the fine be remitted, and in a very able argument Senator Stephen A. Douglas explained why Gen. Jackson was justified in his action in the premises. When the General afterwards met Senator Douglas he expressed his gratitude very warmly, and remarked, "I always knew I was right in what I did, but I never could give a reason for it till I read your speech." [Laughter.] I thought frequently during the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] of that remark of Gen. Jackson's. I was of the same opinion as my colleague [Mr. MANN], but I confess I could not have given as many and as cogent reasons in support of it as he gave.

Now, I repeat, the question before us here is whether these applicants for admission into the Union offer us a scheme of government which is republican in form. If they do, we have no moral right to keep them out of the Union, while I concede we have the physical power to do it, just as I would have the power to thrash the little boy of whom I spoke. But have we the moral right to exercise that power? I think we have not; and, for my part, I am heartily for the resolution offered, because it merely calls their attention to some matters by way of emphasis, but does not deny either of these applicants the right of admission. It is not for us to make fundamental laws for them. It is very well for us to suggest that it were better for them to do this or that, to make this or the other change in their fundamental law, but it is not for us to say, "You shall put this or that in your charter," although, as you present it now, it does provide for a republican form of government, and thus complies with the constitutional requirement. I say we have no moral right to take that position.

Now, do these constitutions provide for a republican form of government? That is the real question before us. I say they do. I have not given them the careful examination that some other gentleman have, but I have listened to many of the arguments and read others, and so far as I know there has been no argument advanced claiming that they do not now offer us constitutions which provide for a republican form of government. And if they do, then I say, so far as the right of the case is concerned we have but one duty to perform, and that is to admit them.

It is argued that many of the provisions in the constitutions offered us are unwise. But what right have we to enter into the question of the internal public policy of either of these proposed States? In my own State we have in our constitution some things which evidently do not meet the approval of the other States. In our constitution of 1870, which is now in operation, there is a provision for minority representation. I do not know of any State which has borrowed that provision, although it has been in force in Illinois for 40 years. It provides for cumulative voting. We divide the State into 51 senatorial districts, and we elect a senator and three representatives from each district. The voter may cast 1 vote for each of three candidates, or 2 votes for one, and 1 for another, 1½ each for two candidates, or 3 votes for one. He can distribute his 3 votes as he pleases among the three candidates in that senatorial district. So far as I am aware, no other State has adopted this scheme, and if the question were up now whether Illinois should be admitted into the Union with that provision in its constitution, gentlemen might argue with as much force that that provision was not a wise one, that it was not sound policy, as they now argue against the alleged objectionable features of those before us.

But my answer to that would be: "Gentlemen, it is none of your business. It is for the people of Illinois to decide that question." [Applause.] And so here there are some provisions in each of these constitutions which I do not approve and which I would not myself write into the organic law.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in what the gentleman says about the constitution of Illinois, and I ask a question entirely for information. How has that provision for cumulative voting worked out? Do the voters, as a matter of fact, generally distribute their votes around, one for each man, or do they follow the cumulative plan?

Mr. GRAHAM. The purpose of it was to enable the minority party in each district to get one representative.

Mr. WILLIS. Does it work out that way?

Mr. GRAHAM. It has worked out that way; but, as far as I know the feelings of the people of Illinois, there is a very strong feeling now that it should be eliminated from the constitution for this reason: That voters from different parties who are not supposed to have a too scrupulous regard for political results can combine and by casting three votes for a particular candidate elect him, although perhaps he should not be elected. In a way it puts a premium on a breach of faith by inducing "plumping" as between two candidates of the same party.

But I am not discussing the merits of it now. I refer to it merely for illustration. I infer from the fact that no other State has adopted it; that it has not met with general approval. I think that is a fair inference, and also that if Illinois were asking admission into the Union here to-day and that provision were in its constitution, gentlemen might object to its admission on that ground. But they would have no right to do it, in my judgment, because such a provision would not deprive Illinois of having a republican form of government, which is the material question and practically the only one before us now.

I listened with very great interest to my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] the other day, and greatly regretted he was not permitted to continue his argument in a consecutive way and without interruption, because, while I did not agree with him, he was presenting the matter in a very concrete and a very logical way. His premises, I think, were unsound, but granting his premises to be sound, the gentleman's mind is so ordered and so orderly that his conclusions will be apt to be sound if his premises are.

Now, the other question is as to the internal public policy of the proposed States, and the one on which he and I disagree. If this question of public policy, of the internal policy of the State is to be considered here, then I repeat that when Illinois, with the provision I referred to in its organic law, came asking for admission, you would probably decide against it because you did not agree with its proposed internal policy. And I am inclined to think the opinion of the majority of the people of Illinois would be in accord with you at this time in saying that it was not the best policy; but again I say you have no right to decide that question for Illinois or for Arizona or New Mexico. You have only the right to decide whether the organic laws offered you here by the people of Arizona and New Mexico present a plan for the government of the future State which is republican in form, and whether the condition of the applicants justifies their admission. Now, that makes acute the question, What is a republican form of government, as intended by the fathers and within the scope and meaning of the language used in the Constitution?

Before taking that up, I want to call attention to the attitude of the minority of the committee here. I have in my hand the "Views of the minority," and I read from it this paragraph:

> We believe that the provision in the Arizona constitution as adopted in that Territory which would authorize 25 per cent of the voters in any judicial district to require an election to be held to see whether some judge who may have rendered an unpopular decision shall be retained in office or ousted from his office is fundamentally destructive of republican form of government.

A main point in that paragraph is the one I emphasize in the reading, "who may have rendered an unpopular decision." Now, that is wholly gratuitous. There is no justification for the insertion of that phrase in the report. Why is that conclusion reached? Who has the right or the power or the wisdom to say whether that would ever happen? I believe that it would not. I firmly believe that it would never happen, but if it did here is the attitude those who take that position put themselves in. They say if that proposition is eliminated—and as public report goes they are in accord with the views of the President of the United States—they say if the judicial recall feature is eliminated they are willing that Arizona shall come in as a State. How would its elimination change the real situation? Would striking that provision out of the constitution make the people of Arizona more fit for statehood? Would striking out that provision under congressional or presidential coercion prove them more capable of self-government? Would they be, in fact, any fitter after than before?

Not in the slightest degree. They are what they are. And whether they come in with the constitution they offer or with the constitution amended as proposed, would in no way affect their capacity for self-government. If they are fit for admission to the sisterhood of States after thus yielding to coercion, they are at least as fit before. Therefore, I say those who signed the minority report admit that Arizona and New Mexico have every qualification for statehood. Is not that all that is required? Again, I say, the main question is: Do they in these constitutions offer a scheme of government republican in form? Now, what is a republican form of government? Of course, you would not be willing to accept my definition of it, so I will give you the views of wiser men. Some reliable definitions will be found in The Federalist. In Letter 38, written by Mr. Madison, he deals with this provision of the Constitution at great length, and, of course, with great ability. He says:

> The first question that offers itself is whether the general form and aspect of the government be strictly republican. It is evident that no other form would be reconcilable with the genius of the people of America, with the fundamental principles of the Revolution, or with their honorable determination, which animates every votary of freedom to rest all political experiments on the capacity of America for self-government. If the plan of the convention, therefore, be found to depart from the republican character, its advocates must abandon it as no longer defensible. What, then, are the distinctive characters of the republican form?
> If we resort, for a criterion, to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on, a government which derives all of its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior. It is essential to such a government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from any inconsiderable proportion or a favored class of it; otherwise a handful of tyrannical nobles, exercising their oppressions by a delegation of their powers, might aspire to the rank of republicans and claim for their government the honorable title of "republic."
> It is sufficient for such a government that the persons administering it be appointed either directly or indirectly by the people and that they hold their appointments by either of the tenures just specified, otherwise every government in the United States, as well as every other popular government that has been or can be well organized or well executed, would be degraded from the republican character.

This definition clearly indicates that a government whose officers serve during the pleasure of the people or for a limited period may be republican in form. What better way to determine the pleasure of the people than by an election, that is, by the plan known as the recall? In the case of Miner against Happersett the Supreme Court of the United States deals with this same constitutional provision. Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the court, says:

> The guaranty is of a republican form of government. No particular government is designated as republican; neither is the exact form to be guaranteed in any manner especially designated. Here, as in other parts of the instrument, we are compelled to resort elsewhere to ascertain what was intended. The guaranty necessarily implies a duty on the part of the States themselves to provide such a government. All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. In all, the people participated, to some extent, through their representatives. These governments the Constitution did not change. They were accepted precisely as they were, and it is therefore to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.

In Downes v. Bidwell, Mr. Justice Brown said:

> A republican form of government is one in which the supreme power resides in the whole body of the people, and is exercised by the representatives elected by them.

And in Duncan v. McCall it was held that—

> The distinguishing feature of that form is the right of the people to choose their own officers for governmental administration and pass their own laws in virtue of the legislative power reposed in representative bodies whose legitimate acts may be said to be those of the people themselves.

Undoubtedly those who framed the Constitution had existing conditions in their minds; a good test, then, would be to examine those conditions, for it will be admitted that all of the 13 States which constituted the Union in that day had republican forms of government, and that such forms as they did have furnish us criteria by which to judge other applicants for admission into the Union, and that if any proposed State approaches as nearly as may be to the form which any of them had it comes within the field of republican government.

Now, they differed very widely in their charters—very widely, indeed—but the field bounded and described by the words "republican form of government" is a wide field, a very wide one, containing governments differing widely in their details. Some of the New England States, and also the State of Georgia, had direct local legislation; others had the indirect method. Connecticut continued till 1818 under the charter granted by King Charles II in 1662, and Rhode Island operated till 1842 under a charter granted by the same King in 1663. But they were both admitted into the Union as having republican forms of government, although they recognized the sovereignty of the King and his successors.

Justice Wilson passed on the status of Georgia in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dallas, 419). He says:

> As a citizen I know the government of Georgia to be republican, and my short definition of such a government is one constructed on this principle—that the supreme power resides in the body of the people.

Justice James Wilson was one of the framers and one of the ablest expounders of the Constitution.

The field of republican government is a big one, but if a State government enters this field at all it is none of our business what part of the field it occupies.

What was the purpose of the fathers? In order to find out what their purpose was let us apply the ordinary rule for statutory construction—the old Blackstonian rule. When the legislature expresses its purpose in words, it is done. It can not construe its own language. It is for the courts to construe it, and one of the fundamental rules of construction is to first ascertain what was the evil intended to be remedied. What is the thing they want to avoid or prevent? Apply that rule in this case and let us put ourselves in the attitude of the fathers.

The Declaration of Independence tells us broadly what the evils were of which they complained and from which they suffered. Some 25 or 30 specific charges are made against the King. The main evils were monarchy and aristocracy, or oligarchy, if you please. The purpose was to avoid these and to bring the work of government nearer to the people, and to fix it so that neither one man nor a minority of men in any community or State could govern. It was to bring the work of government closer to the whole people. Government by a majority might be said to be their first and their main purpose. They tell us that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Now, when any Territory or State offering a constitution in accord with that view is presented here, and there are no valid objections, it seems to me there is but one thing for us to consider, and that is whether it adopts a republican form of government.

In determining this we must keep in mind that monarchy and aristocracy or government by less than a majority was the main difficulty to be avoided, and that the original States give us a sure guide as to what is a republican form of government.

Mr. Madison said:

> As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. The only restriction imposed on them is this, that they shall not exchange republican for antirepublican constitutions, a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered as a grievance.

This fact is also referred to by Judge Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations, and is further emphasized by reference to the provision against granting any titles of nobility. He says:

> The last provisions we shall here notice are that the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government, and that no State shall grant any title of nobility. The purpose of these is to protect a Union, founded on republican principles and composed entirely of republican members, against aristocratic and monarchical innovations.

In his work on the Constitution Judge Story says on this point:

> The Federalist has spoken with so much force and propriety upon this subject that it supersedes all further reasoning. "In a confederacy," says that book, "founded on republican principles and composed of republican members, the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations.

If, then, these "would-be" States have provided for republican form of government, by what right—I mean moral right, I do not mean power—what right have we to exclude them? The only ground such right is put on, so far as I have heard it discussed, is that one of these applicants offers a provision in its constitution for a recall of the judiciary, and for that reason it is contended it should not be admitted into the Union.

Suppose Arizona eliminates this provision as to the recall of judges, and Arizona is admitted. Then what? Has Congress any power to keep it from adopting that provision by way of an amendment to its constitution? Most assuredly it has not. Have we, then, any moral right to say that it shall not come into the Union now because it has a provision in its constitution of which we do not approve, which we concede it can afterwards put into its constitution and still remain in the sisterhood of the Union. Is that consistent? Is there any logic to support such a proposition as that? It is still in the republican field, and if it departs in any way from the usual standard of republican government, it departs in the direction of greater freedom of the people themselves. When you go back to consider the evils which were to be remedied by the adoption of the Federal Constitution and the establishment of this Republic, you find it was an effort to get away from aristocracy and monarchy and get nearer the people. I am not unaware of the fact that some of the able men in the convention, men like Hamilton and possibly Madison and Jay, the joint authors of the articles which constitute the Federalist, and some others who were in sympathy with Hamilton, wanted a government as far removed from the people as possible.

But their ideas did not prevail. The Constitution was a compromise, in the end, between those different forces. But still the fact remains that the constitution tended toward a government by the people, toward a wider range of democracy. That is the direction in which this provision tends. It is bringing the Government nearer to the people.

Now, would any gentleman here contend that a State would not have the right to pass a constitutional amendment to the effect that the judges in that State should serve for only one year, or for six months, if you please? If a State should adopt such a provision in its constitution, what would you do about it? My friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the other day had to concede, and did concede, that that might be done. Would a State thereby lose any of its rights in the Federal Union? Not one. As my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested to-day during a colloquy, "How would you force a State out of the Union?" And I suggested then that possibly the State might be denied representation in Congress—in the Senate and the House—but he did not agree with that view. I suggested a denial of representation merely as the ne plus ultra—the worst that could be done. But it could not be expelled from the Union. I know of no way that it could be. Perhaps some of you do know.

Now, if the State could adopt a constitutional amendment the year after it was admitted to the Union providing for the very thing that you now complain of, what is gained? And that it could do so is admitted. There can be no question on that point. It does seem to me, therefore, most illogical and inconsistent that we should now deliberately refuse to admit a State, otherwise qualified in every respect, because in its fundamental law it has incorporated that which you who oppose its admission admit it can subsequently put there and still remain in the Union.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. You have made the argument that Arizona should not be kept out of the Union because of the recall of the judiciary as provided for in her constitution.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have.

Mr. POWERS. And you have based that argument partly on the ground that the 46 States now in the Union could, if they wanted to do it, put in their constitutions and statutes the judicial recall; and that the Federal Government could not for that reason declare them out of the Union, and if that fact is not sufficient to put a State out of the Union it ought not to be sufficient to keep one from coming in?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is my position.

Mr. POWERS. And I want to add, Mr. Chairman, that that is also my position. I am not in favor of the recall of the judiciary. I would not vote for such a provision to be put in the Kentucky constitution.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman's position is exactly mine in that regard. I will curtail my remarks as much as possible and come to that very point. I state now that personally I would not favor this provision were it proposed to put it in the constitution of my State. I would oppose it. I do not think it wise; but again I repeat, when some other State proposes to do that, it is none of my business. It is a question for the people of that State. Those gentlemen who go further and say that the people of Arizona and the people of New Mexico are qualified for statehood, but that there is some provision as to public policy in their fundamental laws of which those gentlemen do not approve, and therefore they will vote to keep them out of the Union, are, I think, taking a most inconsistent and illogical position, and I quite agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that it is not any of my business, or of his, or of anyone else, what public policy they adopt. They do not have to make everything to fit my judgment or yours. They are to be a self-governing, sovereign State, and they have the right to provide the constitutional and legal provisions under which they are to live, providing always they fit up to the standard of a republican form of government.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do.

Mr. WILLIS. I am very much interested in what my friend has to say upon this question of public policy. I want to know if one of these Territories provided in its constitution for polygamy, that being a question of policy, would the gentleman then say what he has already said, that we have nothing to do with that, and we therefore ought to vote to admit it?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think polygamy is a mere question of public policy. I think it goes far deeper than that. I am one of those cranks who believe that there is a great deal in the Federal Constitution which is not expressed in words. The concrete result of human history is in it between the lines. I believe it rests as fundamentally on the doctrines of the Christian religion, although that is not expressed in it, and probably should not be, as it does on the provisions that are expressed. I think that monogamy, the doctrine of Christian marriage, of one husband and one wife, and the family relation, and those things that go with it, are fundamental and necessary to the perpetuity of the Republic and as much a part of the Constitution as any of the provisions expressed in it; and should we leave monogamy and adopt plural marriages, in my judgment we would sap the foundations of the home and virtually destroy the family, which is the unit of society, the brick of which the building we call society is constructed. I say that is not a mere matter of State policy, but it is a matter that is fundamental to the existence and perpetuity of the Republic.

There are some defects of policy in both of the constitutions now proposed, one possibly going too far in one direction, one in the other direction. It is claimed one goes too far toward centralized power and that the other goes too far toward democratic power. They do not suit the inclination or the judgment of some gentlemen in this House; but that is not the question here. However, if one is to be admitted, then the other ought to be. If there are errors in the proposed constitutions as to matters of public policy, I think they are about equal; or if there is any difference in them, in my opinion the defect is greater in the New Mexico constitution. But that will not prevent me from voting for it. It is republican in form. It suits a majority of the people of the Territory, as shown by an election in which no fraud is shown. And nothing but fraud could vitiate it; and in the absence of fraud I must assume that it is what the people of New Mexico want, and that is enough for me. It is republican in form, and it suits them; and therefore I am ready to vote for it. Here, on the other hand, is Arizona, with a constitution equally republican in form, or more so. She knocks at the door for admission also, and I say to you, so far as my vote is concerned, if one comes in the other must come in also. That may not be perfectly just, but there is a good deal of human nature in it if it is not according to the highest and strictest principles of equity.

The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] a while ago made a point that seems to me to have a good deal of merit in it. He suggested that, after all, experiment in the work of government is not a bad thing. I quite agree with him. Some very eminent man, who wrote on social and historical lines—and if I had a guess I would say it was Buckle, the essayist and historian—said in substance that it is only by practicing the uncustomary that we can find out whether it should become customary. There is a good deal of philosophy and good common sense in that remark. How are we ever going to advance if we never try? How will the child learn to walk if it never takes a second step? And so in this case. I do not know whether this is, in fact, going to be a good thing or not. I am conservative by nature, and if it were proposed in my State I would not be for it, but I think that the recall will prove a very valuable feature in government. Now, whether it should apply to the judiciary, I am not yet convinced one way or the other, but I am perfectly willing that some other State than my own shall make the experiment. [Laughter.] If it is a good thing, then we can get it, and if it is not, then we can avoid it. Now, the people of Arizona are very willing to make that experiment. Why should I object to it? The statement in the minority report, which contains the gratuitous statement I read, particularly mentions, "The judge who may have rendered an unpopular decision." By what authority did the minority of the committee assume or presume that because a judge has rendered an unpopular judgment the people would throw him out of office? Where is the experience which justifies that statement? I have on the floor here again and again during this debate heard that Chief Justice Marshall, after he rendered certain decisions, would have been thrown out of office by virtue of the recall if it had existed. Who knows? That is but their guess, and I put mine against it.

I have known a number of cases in my own judicial district where judges have rendered exceedingly unpopular decisions on the eve of an election. I can recall one which grew out of a certain riot you may have read of, in Springfield, a few years ago. The judge, whose term of office had almost expired, who was then a candidate for reelection, ruled what he deemed to be the law of the case. It was exceedingly unpopular with the people. The people's minds were aflame on the subject. Did it affect his judgment? Not in the slightest degree. He followed where he thought duty and the law led, and he usually thinks right on that line. Now, he was a candidate. He had opposition. What was the effect on him? Why, there was nobody else in the running. I have known other cases of the same kind. Gentlemen, you who oppose this provision in the Arizona constitution, you lack faith in the honesty, the intelligence, and the sincerity of the common man. He is a bigger fellow than you think he is. He is moved less by prejudice or by passion than you think he is, and he usually rises to the level of the responsibility placed on him. Responsibility is a great thing to make men pause and deliberate.

At the time the Constitution was adopted all judges were appointed. There was no elective judiciary, I think, about 1812, when Georgia broke away from the appointive plan and made its State judiciary elective. If gentlemen who now so much fear the recall of judges had lived then they would have seen all sorts of calamities ahead. But the plan worked very well; so well that every State now has it, and none think of abandoning it.

It was a very much longer stride toward pure democracy than the one proposed now. It was a more radical departure than the one adopted by Arizona, but no question was ever raised as to its being in conformity with republican institutions. And I have faith enough in the people to believe that this provision is not the Pandora's box gentlemen would have us believe.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] argued that a provision like the recall or the referendum would only take responsibility from the legislators and cast it on the people, and therefore the legislators have even less sense of responsibility and exercise a less degree of care than they do now. I do not think that would be the effect of it at all. But even if it did throw less of a burden on the legislators and a greater burden on the people themselves, what of it? Responsibility is one of the greatest things in the world to sober people and make them think, and so it seems to me that this question of the recall would set men to thinking, and that instead of exciting their passions and prejudices it would have the effect rather of cooling them, and that even if they did make one mistake—and maybe they would; I do not know—but if they did make a mistake, after making it they would know things better; they would have located Charybdis and would probably avoid it thereafter.

That is one way to teach people if they need teaching. If you want them to rise to the responsibilities of self-government let the responsibility for their government rest upon them, and if they do make a mistake are you going to condemn them for that? Did we never make mistakes? Has Congress never made any? Have the courts never made any? If not, why do they so frequently reverse themselves; and why can you find the same question decided in one way on one side of a State line and a different way on the other side of the line?

Courts make mistakes; legislatures make mistakes; Congress makes mistakes; and will you deprive the people of the exercise of a right which you admit they have inherently for fear they would some time make a mistake? If they do, they will learn from it. And so, I say, that as an experiment, if you please, it is more than worth the while. I should be glad to see it. As I selfishly said a while ago, I am quite willing that some other State than mine should make the experiment. We can watch the result of it, and if it is worthy of imitation, we can imitate it; if it is not worthy of it, just as in the case of minority representation in my State, it will not be imitated. Just as other States did not follow the State of Illinois on the matter of minority representation, because it did not seem to be the thing needed, just so, if this matter of recall in Arizona does not prove to be a good thing, then it will not be followed by other States. And, I predict, Illinois will soon abandon that feature of its constitution and abolish its minority representation, and just so Arizona, if it does not like this principle, can abandon it, and no harm will have been done to republican form of government.

Now, I would warn gentlemen in conclusion—although they do not have to heed the warning, and perhaps I do not owe it to them—that they can not deceive the people. One of the gentlemen who spoke on the other side, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I think, clearly intimated that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber were influenced in opposing the admission of New Mexico by partisan reasons. I have not been in Congress long enough to know whether that is likely to be true or not. Some of you, perhaps, have been.

But does the gentleman from Wyoming think that he can play ostrich; that he can hide his head only and escape detection? Even if it be as he says, are the ones on this side the only ones? Does he think he can convince the people that his side of the House is not playing the partisan game? How about that? That is tender, slippery ground to tread on, and I would not think of going in on it but for the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming. But we should rise above those party considerations. And I say now that they do not affect me in this matter. I am for fair play. I believe in what I used to call "criminal equity." I believe that if two men commit an offense against the law, the State's attorney has no right to pick out one of them and prosecute him and let the other one go when the facts of both cases are similar. And in this case I do not believe that it is right, with two candidates knocking at the door for admission on practically similar terms, to admit one and exclude the other. Such a course would not commend itself to fair-minded men. The matter of partisan advantage should be ignored. Both should come in or both should stay out. I say, further, that neither this House, this Congress, nor anyone else has a right from such motive as that to keep a State out of the Union which is qualified in every way for admission and which comes before us and offers a charter or constitution which conforms to the requirements of the Federal Constitution. Congress has no moral right to do such a thing. I stand on the ground that this resolution is perfectly fair, for in substance it means that both shall come in or neither shall. That is the ground on which I stand, and I shall vote for it, and I hope it will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise to say that I shall give my vote for the adoption of the resolution presented by the majority of the Committee on Territories for the addition of two new States by admitting New Mexico and Arizona into our American Union. I have no doubt that a considerable majority of the Members of this House will so vote, in spite of the rather lengthy discussion to which we have listened with relation to various theories of government.

I shall support this resolution in spite of the apparent approval of the constitutions of these new States which such a vote would indicate, because I believe that the framers of these constitutions have held fast to the principles which were in the minds of our fathers when they framed our Government.

I take this opportunity to protest against the present-day tendencies to depart from those principles. I object to the growing tendencies of the executive and judicial branches of our Government, both National and State, to usurp the functions of the legislative branch.

I have made as a fundamental point that no branch of the Government should invade the legitimate province of any other branch. Our fathers declared that this was to be a Government of laws and not of men. They declared that we should have a legislature to record, from time to time, the will of the American people in the form of Federal and State statutes; they declared, too, that we should have a judiciary whose duty should be to interpret such statutes in the light of the organic law and of its principles. They declared, also, there should be an Executive whose sole duty should be to carry out, as the agent of the people, the laws that the people's representatives have put upon the books.

Political writers, not only of our own country, but of almost every civilized country in the world, have glorified the beauties of this system of checks and balances that our fathers founded.

I believe that just so long as we observe the fine adjustment of powers that was arranged by our fathers there never can be any serious disturbance of long continuance in our internal government.

I call to your mind a familiar truth when I say that of late years there has been a decided tendency on the part of other branches to usurp legislative powers.

I protest against the use of the "big stick" which was characteristic of a former Chief Executive.

I protest against Executive interference in pending legislation by sending for Representatives and threatening the withholding of Federal patronage unless the will of the Executive be made the will of the Legislature.

I protest against this perversion, and I urge upon my countrymen a speedy return to the principles of the fathers.

We have heard much in the course of this debate about that clause of the constitution of Arizona which provides for the recall of judges. What has caused the agitation for the recall of judges which has resulted in a provision for that system in the constitution of a future State?

I can not believe that distrust of the individuals who sit upon the bench has caused it nearly so much as the judicial usurpation of legislative powers. The people of the country, like the people of the States, have frequent opportunities to pass judgment upon the men who are elected as Representatives. If they do not trust us, if they do not trust our fellow Representatives in the various States, it is an easy matter for them to show their displeasure at any of the frequent elections. The nature of the legislator's work puts him in close touch with the thoughts and the hopes of his people, and it is his aim to write laws for their benefit and protection.

We have but this week witnessed a great public protest against an almost unanimous decision of the highest court in our land. We find that court, called upon to interpret an enactment of the Congress, construing a statute in a manner to cause a division within the court. The majority of the court has made a distinction between "reasonable" and "unreasonable" restraint of trade. The statute which they had under consideration makes no reference to reasonable or unreasonable restraint. The people, through their Representatives, considered that any combination in restraint of trade was illegal, and advisedly wrote the statute without any qualifying words. We find that numerous attempts to amend the statute by including the word "unreasonable" have repeatedly failed.

I call attention to one paragraph from the special message of the President of the United States to Congress, transmitted to the Senate January 7, 1910. I read from page 16:

Many people conducting great businesses have cherished a hope and a belief that in some way or other a line may be drawn between "good trusts" and "bad trusts," and that it is possible by amendment to the antitrust law to make a distinction under which good combinations may be permitted to organize, suppress competition, control prices, and do it all legally, if only they do not abuse the power by taking too great profit out of the business. They point with force to certain notorious trusts as having grown into power through criminal methods by the use of illegal rebates and plain cheating, and by various acts utterly violative of business honesty or morality, and urge the establishment of some legal line of separation by which "criminal trusts" of this kind can be punished, and they, on the other hand, be permitted under the law to carry on their business. Now, the public, and especially the business public, ought to rid themselves of the idea that such a distinction is practicable or can be introduced into the statute. Certainly under the present antitrust law no such distinction exists. It has been proposed, however, that the word "reasonable" should be made a part of the statute, and then that it should be left to the court to say what is a reasonable restraint of trade, what is a reasonable suppression of competition, what is a reasonable monopoly. I venture to think that this is to put into the hands of the court a power impossible to exercise on any consistent principle which will insure the uniformity of decision essential to just judgment. It is to thrust upon the courts a burden that they have no precedents to enable them to carry, and to give them a power approaching the arbitrary, the abuse of which might involve our whole judicial system in disaster.

I shall not attempt to discuss the legal aspect of this situation, as my entire purpose has been merely to call attention to certain political tendencies. I rejoice, however, that we have one member of the court who stood alone and opposed to the rest of his fellows in the assertion that the judiciary should not attempt to legislate, but only to decide what the Legislature had enacted.

I quote from an article in the Philadelphia North American of May 18, 1911 (p. 13):

Justification of the decision, so strongly attempted by the court itself and supplemented by efforts of tory newspapers and great corporation interests, is made more difficult, in the opinion of the progressives in Congress, by an examination of the records of the court itself.

Effort has been made to create the impression that the court heretofore had been called upon to decide only specific violations of the law and had never before considered the law in its entirety with regard to its effect in general application to the business of the country. In other words, that the court had never before been called upon to apply the rule of reason to the operation of the law and to decide what are and what are not unreasonable restraints of trade. The records, however, show that in nearly every case which has been brought before the court the lawyers for the defense—that is, for the violators of the antitrust act—have sought to invoke the rule of reasonableness, and as Justice Harlan had declared in his great dissenting opinion, the court had heretofore invariably declined to read "reasonable" into the statute.

SUPPORT FOR JUSTICE HARLAN.

A notable instance of this is found in the trans-Missouri case, argued and decided before any of the present members of the court, except Justice Harlan and Chief Justice White, were even thought of as Supreme Court possibilities. Here it is found that the brief of Judson Harmon, then Attorney General of the United States, contains page after page of strong argument against the contention of the combined railroads that the reasonableness of their agreement must be considered. They based their contention upon the construction which had been given the common law as it relates to restraints of trade.

Judson Harmon, for the Government, contends that there could be no reference to the common law in connection with so specific a statute as the antitrust law. He said:

"It is incredible that Congress, dealing in obedience to the popular demand for relief from a great and growing evil which affected the entire people, intended to qualify the relief it granted by leaving its enforcement to depend on the varying views of other tribunals as to public policy. No such intention is expressed, nor is there the slightest ground for implying it. On the contrary, Congress declared in no uncertain terms the public policy with respect to the trade and commerce committed to its care and control, instead of leaving it to be discovered or pieced out from the multitude of conflicting decisions, of which the briefs afford abundant examples."

The significance of this argument is due to the fact that the court sustained it absolutely; refused to go to the common law for an interpretation of the statute, and declined to consider the reasonableness of the railroad combination at the request of the railroad attorneys. The records of the court are as unvarying as those of the Congress in showing absolute refusal to consider the statute, except as it was written, until the decision of Monday.

I believe that the people of this land will not long continue to permit the practice of interference with their will, as reflected by the legislature. I do not believe that an Executive will ever again be permitted to use his great office to influence the honest judgment of men in the legislative branch of the Government.

I look upon this feature of the constitution for the recall of judges as an indication that the people are ready to protest against interference with their representatives, whether that interference may come from a declaiming Executive or a dignified judiciary. [Applause.]

I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas statistics emanating from the Department of Commerce and Labor bear witness to the fact that since the tariff on shoes was reduced from 25 per cent to 10 per cent a rapid increase in imports of boots and shoes has occurred; and

Whereas the bill now under consideration by the National Congress and known as House of Representatives No. 4413 proposes to remove all duty from such imports: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Joint Shoe Council No. 1 of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, representing 13,000 shoe workers of Brockton, Mass., expresses its opposition to the proposed legislation, believing such action would prove detrimental to their interests; and be it further

Resolved, That we believe conditions in the shoe trade of the United States where unlimited and untrammeled competition exists are such that no possible benefit could be conferred on any portion of the country by the admission of boots and shoes free of duty; therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge upon Congress the necessity of retaining not only the present tariff on boots and shoes, but to consider the advisability of an increase in the same, to the end that the home market will be conserved for the product of American workmen.

PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I present a letter from H. Q. Alexander, president of the North Carolina division of the Farmers' Educational Cooperative Union of America, approving the bill to promote the cause of agricultural education in States. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA DIVISION,
Matthews, N. C., May 20, 1911.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I want to say that I most heartily approve your bill for promoting the cause of agricultural education in States that will appropriate an equal amount. This bill is progressive and constructive.

It goes directly to the fountain head of all real and permanent wealth of the Nation—its citizenship. With an intelligent, efficient, and productive citizenship, our growth and development would have far outstripped our present achievements, great as they have been. If half of the money which has been expended since the Civil War on the Army and Navy alone had been used in educating our people in the productive sciences and arts and in building post roads, as required by the Constitution, our growth and power in wealth and population would have been 50 years in advance of present conditions. Our Government has nurtured and protected the dollar, but has ignored the man who produced the dollar primarily. Had we pursued the policy of education, efficiency, and prosperity of the great producing masses of our citizenship, we would not now be menaced with the high cost of living and have to turn our hungry faces to another country for food products.

I do hope you will succeed in pushing your bill through Congress. If we had fewer politicians and more statesmen in Congress, you would have no difficulty in passing the bill.

With kind regards, I am,

Yours, fraternally, H. Q. ALEXANDER.

NATIONAL CONTROL OVER ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I present the views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary upon the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States. I ask that the report be printed, and that it also be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be printed under the rule, and without objection the order to print in the RECORD will be made as requested.

The views of the minority (S. Rept. No. 35), submitted by Mr. SUTHERLAND from the Committee on the Judiciary, are as follows:

NATIONAL CONTROL OVER ELECTION OF SENATORS.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 39, PROPOSING AN AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION PROVIDING THAT SENATORS SHALL BE ELECTED BY THE PEOPLE OF THE SEVERAL STATES.

The undersigned members of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary dissent from the action of the committee in reporting favorably House joint resolution No. 39 on the following grounds. The resolution as reported is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branches of the State legislature.

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution."

This contains two separate and distinct amendments to the Constitution. The first is an amendment to section 3 of Article I so as to provide for the direct election of Senators by the people. The second is an amendment of section 4 of Article I so as to destroy the power which the National Government now has to regulate and direct the time and manner of electing Members of its own Senate.

The fourth section of the first article now reads as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

This provision requires the State legislatures, in the performance of a duty under the National Constitution, to regulate the times and manner of holding elections both for Senators and Representatives, and gives the National Congress power at any time by law to make or alter such regulations.

Under this provision it was clearly contemplated that the authority to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives and Senators should primarily vest in the State legislatures, but that the ultimate power to make or alter such regulations should forever remain in the hands of the Federal Government. It is manifest that the framers of the Constitution intended that this supervisory power on the part of Congress should exist independently of the way in which the Members of Congress should be elected. Representatives, under the Constitution, are now elected by the people; Senators are elected by the various legislatures, but in both instances the authority of Congress to regulate the election is preserved.

There would seem to be no doubt that if the Constitution had originally provided for the popular election of Senators as it did for the election of Representatives, provision would have been made for the supervisory control by Congress over such elections, just as it is now provided with respect to elections by the legislatures.

The resolution, as reported, leaves the duty of the State legislatures and the power of Congress the same, so far as Representatives are concerned; but, so far as Senators are concerned, it strikes out the words which empower the Congress at any time by law to make or alter the regulations, and it thus transfers from the National Congress to the State legislatures the power of control over the election of Senators, which the National Government now has and has had since the beginning of the Government, and which it has and will continue to have over the election of Representatives.

The resolution also makes another change in section 4, which will be important in determining the construction of the instrument and the nature of the powers to be exercised by the State legislatures. The present provision is a command to the State legislatures to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections, subject to the ultimate authority of Congress. In performing that function the State legislatures are discharging a duty under the Constitution of the United States—acting by its authority. The proposed amendment inserts the word "as" before the word "prescribed," and makes the provision read: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof." The command to the State legislatures is thus taken out of the Constitution, and the legislatures, in making such regulations as they see fit to make, will be performing no duty imposed upon them by the Constitution of the United States, but exercising, according to their own will and pleasure, an authority to which the Government of the United States will be subjected.

As to these proposed changes in section 4 of Article I, we consider—

First. That they are unnecessary to accomplish the purpose of securing the direct election of Senators by the people. They do not aid or contribute to the direct election of Senators in any manner or degree. There is no reason why the ultimate authority of the National Government over the times and manner of electing Senators by direct, popular vote should not continue to be exercised, just as it always has been exercised, over the direct election of Representatives by popular vote. The exercise of that national power over the popular election of Representatives meets now with no objection, and, under the proposed amendment, is to continue. The proposed change from legislative election of Senators to popular election of Senators furnishes no reason whatever for destroying the ultimate power of control over the election of Senators which the National Congress now has under the Constitution.

Second. The abandonment of national authority by the proposed changes in section 4 would be a fundamental and vital change in our system of government, and should be regarded as far more important than the change from legislative to direct election of Senators, to which it has been attached in the resolution reported as if it were merely incidental and subordinate. The present provision contained in section 4 of Article I was adopted by the framers of the Constitution after full discussion and upon great consideration. The conclusion expressed in the section as adopted was an assertion of the ultimate authority of the National Government over the steps necessary to constitute the Government and to insure its continued exercise and power to act. It was one of a series of provisions which established definitely the distinction between the old Confederation, under which the Central Government was dependent upon the States, and the new National Government, which was to contain within itself every element of power essential to its continued existence and effectiveness. The proposed change would reverse that conclusion, would change the theory and the nature of the relations between the National Government and the several States, and would leave the Nation dependent upon the several States and without authority of its own in respect of an essential part of the machinery necessary to its continued existence.

How vital is the preservation of the supervisory power conferred upon Congress by section 4 of Article I was strongly set forth by the Supreme Court of the United States through Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion in the Yarbrough case (110 U. S., 651). In that case the Supreme Court was passing upon the validity of the Federal election law of 1870, an act based upon the authority conferred by the first clause of section 4 of Article I. We quote from the opinion as follows:

"That a Government whose essential character is republican, whose executive head and legislative body are both elective, whose most numerous and powerful branch of the legislature is elected by the people directly, has no power by appropriate laws to secure this election from the influence of violence, of corruption, and of fraud, is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention and demand the gravest consideration. * * *

"If this Government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the General Government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption.

"If it has not this power it is left helpless before the two great natural and historical enemies of all republics—open violence and insidious corruption.

"It is as essential to the successful working of this Government that the great organisms of its executive and legislative branches should be the free choice of the people as that the original form of it should be so. In absolute governments, where the monarch is the source of all power, it is still held to be important that the exercise of that power shall be free from the influence of extraneous violence and internal corruption.

"In a republican government like ours, where political power is reposed in Representatives of the entire body of the people, chosen at short intervals by popular election, the temptations to control these elections by violence and by corruption is a constant source of danger. * * *

"If the Government of the United States has within its constitutional domain no authority to provide against these evils, if the very sources of power may be poisoned by corruption or controlled by violence and outrage, without legal restraint, then, indeed, is the country in danger, and its best powers, its highest purposes, the hopes which it inspires, and the love which enshrines it, are at the mercy of the combinations of those who respect no right but brute force on the one hand and unprincipled corruptionists on the other."

The Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives constitute one of the three great departments of the Federal Government upon whose existence and efficiency the very life of the Nation depends. To say that one branch of this department shall be in the absolutely uncontrolled power of the various State governments is to deny the supremacy of the Federal Government, and to that extent make it subordinate to the government of the several States. No matter what laws the State governments may pass regulating the time and manner of the election of Senators, no matter how profound may be the effect of such laws upon the efficiency of the Senate, the Federal Government, if this resolution shall be finally adopted, will be utterly powerless to protect itself. It would seem that the mere statement of such a contingency, however remote its happening may appear to be, should be sufficient to prevent its adoption. No harm can possibly result from a continuation of the supervisory power in the hands of Congress, while infinite harm might follow its destruction.

Third. That possession by the National Government of the power of control over the election of its own legislative bodies is a matter of practical concern is shown by the fact that it has been found necessary to exercise that control in the past regarding both branches of the National Legislature. It was found necessary to regulate the election of Representatives by a national statute passed in 1842, and by further statutes in 1872, under which those elections are still held, and it was found necessary to regulate the legislative proceeding for the election of Senators by national statute in 1866. The Federal election law of 1870 and the subsequent amendments of that law were based upon this provision of the Constitution. No one can tell when the further or renewed exercise of that power may be of the highest importance to the National Government. A moment's reflection will indicate that the greatest inconvenience and possibility of abuse might grow out of a variety of regulations in the different States fixing different times and ways of electing Senators in the absence of any power in the National Government to require a general and harmonious system throughout the States.

But it is not requisite to show how the exercise of the power will be necessary in the future. It rests upon those who wish to destroy the power, to show that there can be no need of it in the future. This has not been, and can not be, successfully attempted.

Fourth. It is not proposed to disturb the power which section 5 of Article I of the Constitution confers upon each House of Congress to "be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members." That power is essential. It must rest somewhere, and under our system, which separates the judicial and legislative branches, it can rest nowhere but in the legislative bodies themselves. It has been exercised by the House of Representatives in respect of the popular election of its Members in more than 400 cases during the 122 years of the Government's existence. The continuance of the power to regulate the time and manner of holding elections, which it is proposed to strike out from section 4 of Article I, is necessary to enable the Houses of Congress to perform the duty of judging of the elections and returns of their Members. In order to perform that duty Congress must have the power to require that elections shall be held at such times and in such manner that there shall be competent and sufficient evidence available to enable the judging body to get at the truth and secure a basis for a just judgment.

Fifth. Possession of the power which it is proposed to strike out from section 4 is essential to enable the National Government to act effectively in case it should ever have occasion to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. The basis of any enforcement of those provisions must necessarily be the ascertainment and establishment of the facts in respect of the elections to which they may relate. The proposed amendment of section 4 of Article I, if adopted, would be the latest expression of the sovereign will of the people of the United States, and would take away from the National Government authority to make those regulations regarding elections which are essential to the preservation of evidence regarding what actually occurs.

There may be a difference of opinion as to whether the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments should remain in the Constitution, but it surely can not be thought consistent with the dignity and honor of the United States to leave them in the Constitution and at the same time surrender the power which would be necessary for their enforcement.

Sixth. The proposed amendment of section 4, depriving the United States of its authority over the ultimate control of the election of the Members of its Senate, has not been demanded or sought by the people of the United States. It has had no general discussion or consideration by them. It has had no general discussion or consideration in Congress. It has been proposed and reported as if it were an incident to another amendment to which it bears no necessary relation; as if it were a light and trifling matter; and no just basis exists upon which the Senate of the United States can now take the grave and serious step of proposing it to the State legislatures.

Seventh. It has been contended by some that even if the provision of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the authority to regulate the times and manner of the election of Senators shall be eliminated full power will still exist under other general provisions. We are unable to agree with this contention. Under the resolution express power is granted to the States to regulate this subject. The language is exclusive; the whole power is granted to the State, and nothing whatever upon this subject is reserved to Congress. To expressly grant exclusive power over the subject to the State governments is equivalent to a denial of the same power to the General Government, and nothing can be clearer than that such express and exclusive grant would foreclose the General Government from exercising the same power under any general language contained in the Constitution.

It has been suggested that the right to vote for a Member of Congress is a right guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and that Congress would therefore have the implied power to pass any regulation necessary to preserve this right. It is to be observed, however, that the power to regulate the time and manner of the election of Senators is to be specifically granted to the State legislatures, and it is difficult to understand how an implied power can exist in one agent to do a thing under general language where the identical power has been specifically and in exclusive terms granted to another.

The resolution now before the Senate is an exact copy of the joint resolution reported by Representative Tucker, of Virginia, in the Fifty-second Congress. Mr. Tucker, who was an able lawyer, in the course of his report, stated:

"It is proposed to abrogate and annul the above [referring to clause 1, section 4] in so far as it gives to Congress any control, absolute or remote and contingent, over the election of United States Senators by substituting the following language for so much thereof as refers to the election of Senators: 'The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.'"

Here is a plain, straightforward, candid statement of one of the great lawyers of the country, who knew precisely what he desired to accomplish; that the effect of this portion of the resolution is to annul clause 1 of section 4 as far as it gives Congress any control "absolute or remote and contingent," and, in the opinion of the minority members of the committee, Mr. Tucker's view of the matter is entirely correct. If the proposed change in the language of clause 1 of section 4 does not have this result and does not have the effect to deprive Congress of its power in the premises, we are somewhat at a loss to understand what its proponents, who take this view, seek to gain.

Eighth. The two proposed amendments ought to be considered separately, and each upon its own merits. The existing tendency toward the direct election of Senators by the people ought not to be made a vehicle or pretext for getting the approval of Congress to an entirely separate and distinct proposal to destroy Federal control over elections. The people of the country ought not to be compelled to approve, through their legislatures, a change which they may not desire as the price of securing another change which they may desire. In order to prevent this unfair and injurious treatment of the subject, we recommend that the resolution be amended to read as follows:

"Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"'The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"'When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

"'This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.'"

FURTHER VIEWS OF MESSRS. DILLINGHAM, BRANDEGEE, AND ROOT.

The undersigned, who have joined in the foregoing expression of views regarding the amendment of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, wish also to put upon record an expression of their opinion that the amendment of section 3 of Article I so as to provide for the direct election of Senators by the people instead of by State legislatures is inexpedient and unnecessary. We think that the change would be injurious rather than beneficial, and that the abuses which have led to the proposal of the amendment can be obviated by a simple act of legislation, without any amendment to the Constitution. A bill for that purpose (S. 123) is now pending in the Senate.

RECPROCITY WITH CANADA.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 45), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have printed such hearings and such other papers as may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects heretofore considered or to be considered by said committee during the Sixty-second Congress, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, after consultation with several Members of this body, and in view of the action of the upper branch of the Legislature of Illinois relating to the seat of Senator LORIMER of that State in this body, as reported in the public press, I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be read, and that it may lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 46) was read as follows:

Whereas since the action by the Senate on the resolution of June 20, 1910, relating to the seat of WILLIAM LORIMER, it is represented that new testimony has been discovered; and

Whereas the Senate of the State of Illinois did on the 18th day of May, 1911, adopt the following resolutions:

"Whereas under senate resolution No. 17 a committee was appointed to investigate charges of corruption and official misconduct against members of this senate; and

"Whereas said committee has reported the result of its investigation to this senate, from which it appears that there were important and material witnesses without the State of Illinois, whose attendance it could not legally compel and which witnesses refused voluntarily to appear; and

"Whereas said committee was seriously impeded in the performance of its duties by what we believe to be the unwarranted action of a certain judge; and

"Whereas it appears from the report of said committee that despite its inability to compel the attendance of such foreign witnesses and the adverse action of said judge sufficient evidence was procured to show that without bribery and corruption and by reason of the failure of certain senators and representatives during the different roll calls to carry out the will of the people, as expressed at the polls, in the choice for a United States Senator, which action we deem most reprehensible and should be condemned, and which we hereby condemn: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this senate, based upon the report and findings of the said committee, that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in the United States Senate was brought about by bribery and corruption; and

"Resolved, That the gravity of the situation, involving as it does the integrity and good name of this State and the welfare of the Nation, demands a further investigation and determination of this matter by a body possessing broader jurisdiction and greater powers than does this senate; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of this senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transmit to the Senate of the United States a copy of the evidence taken by the said committee, together with the report and findings of that committee and a copy of this resolution for such action as the Senate of the United States may deem proper.

"Resolved, That the findings of said committee, as set forth in the report heretofore filed, be, and the same are hereby, ratified and approved."

Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections are authorized and directed to further investigate the charges made against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to inquire and report to the Senate whether in or about the election of the said WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, or in connection with his right to a seat in this body there were used or employed by any person, firm, corporation, or association any corrupt methods or practices.

That said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress; to hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; to employ stenographers and such counsel and competent accountants as it may deem necessary; to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

CONSIDERATION OF BILLS ON THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will report the first business on the calendar.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, was announced as first in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made; and the joint resolution goes over.

DESIGNATION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1095) to authorize the surveyor of the District of Columbia to adopt the system of designating land in the District of Columbia in force in the office of the assessor of said District was announced as next in order, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the particular mischief which it is designed to obviate?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, this bill is similar to one which has already once passed the Senate. The report of the committee explains it better than I could, as I am not particularly familiar with the indexing and recording systems of the District. If the Secretary will read the fine print of the report, which is very short, I think it will explain to the Senator from Indiana precisely what is the object of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report as requested.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, perhaps a word from me will obviate the necessity of even reading any part of the report.

There is a system in vogue in the office of the assessor of the District of Columbia whereby parcels of land are described very accurately, while the surveyor has an entirely different system, so that a purchaser of property here finds it difficult to get a correct description of his property. This bill simply provides that the surveyor shall adopt the same system that is in vogue in the office of the other official and that there shall be a very simple method provided in the matter of designating land in this District.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is, to have the same system in the assessor's and in the surveyor's office?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely. The assessor's system has worked most admirably. That is all there is to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will the state the amendment to the bill recommended by the committee.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, line 14, after the word "not," it is proposed to strike out "unless for good cause shown to him," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That hereafter all instruments tendered for record in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia in which original lots, subdivision lots, squares, or tracts are mentioned shall, in addition to any other description, contain a reference to the square or parcel shown on the plats and plans as filed for record in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia in which the real estate intended to be affected is contained, and the recorder of deeds shall not receive any instrument for record unless the provisions of this act are therein complied with.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARREARAGES OF DISTRICT TAXES.

The bill (S. 1082) to receive arrearages of taxes due to the District of Columbia to July 1, 1908, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JEANNIE TURNBULL.

The bill (S. 19) authorizing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding title of the United States to lots 3 and 4, square 103, in the city of Washington, D. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to grant to the present occupant of original lots 3 and 4, square 103, in the city of Washington, a quit-claim deed of the legal title of the United States to those lots, it having appeared that the United States has no other interest therein or claim thereto than a record title resulting from a failure to comply with the requirement of the act of the Maryland Legislature of December 19, 1791, relative to the recording of deeds in the original city of Washington; but the occupant of the lots shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War his or her title to the premises, saving only the aforesaid outstanding legal title of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there are two bills on the calendar, practically for the same purpose, as to which there is some confusion. I should like to call attention to one of them. I think there is an omission in the bill which has just been passed. It provides for no grantee. In line 3, page 1, it says:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to grant to the present occupant—

It does not say who the occupant is. The words "Jeannie Turnbull" should be inserted. It would not be careful legislation to provide for the transfer of land by the United States to a person unnamed, and I ask that the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, may be reconsidered, and then I shall offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed will be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is now in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to strike out the words "the present," in lines 3 and 4, and to insert in lieu thereof the name "Jeannie Turnbull" and a comma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, before the word "occupant," it is proposed to strike out the words "the present" and to insert the name "Jeannie Turnbull" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, on page 2, line 1, after the word "the," where it occurs near the end of the line, I move to insert the word "said," so as to read "the said occupant."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, before the word "occupant," it is proposed to insert the word "said."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. In line 3, on page 2, I move to strike out the words "his or," before the word "her."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, before the word "her," it is proposed to strike out the words "his or," so as to read "her title to said premises."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT LICENSE TAX.

The bill (S. 29) to amend paragraph 43 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend paragraph 43 of the act by adding the following:

Provided, That such classification shall not be applied to booksellers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TITLE TO CERTAIN LOTS IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 20) directing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding legal title of the United States to sublots Nos. 31, 32, and 33 of original lot No. 3, square No. 80, in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 1087) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better registration of births in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1907, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the word "Labor," to strike out "and such other data, if any, as the commissioners of said District deem needful," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any physician or midwife who attends at the birth of any child within the District of Columbia, and any person whomsoever, who, in the absence of a physician or midwife, performs any of the offices usually rendered by such, shall execute, or cause to be executed, and shall file with the health officer of said District within 24 hours immediately following the date of such birth a proper report thereof, written in ink, on a blank furnished by said health officer, embodying all such data as may be necessary for the purposes of the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce and Labor. So far as relates to any data aforesaid not based upon the personal observation of the physician, midwife, or other person by whom report is made, every such report shall show the name and address of the informant and the relationship of said informant to the child born: Provided, however, That if the child born be illegitimate it shall in no case be necessary for any physician, midwife, or other person to indicate on any report required by this act any fact or facts whereby the identity of the father or of the mother or of the child born will be disclosed: And provided further, That no report need be made of stillbirths when the fetus delivered has apparently not passed the fifth month of utero-gestation.

Upon receipt of any report aforesaid, said health officer shall forward to the father of the child, or, if his address be unknown, to the mother, an acknowledgment of the receipt of such report; and if the infant delivered be not stillborn, and such report does not contain the given name of the child born, a blank form on which the father or mother may certify over his or her signature the name of such child, which form, if thus executed and returned to said health officer within three months next following the date of birth, shall be a part of the official record of such birth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF KENYON STREET.

The bill (S. 30) to provide for the extension of Kenyon Street from Seventeenth Street to Mount Pleasant Street and for the extension of Seventeenth Street from Kenyon Street to Irving Street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDENING OF SIXTEENTH STREET NW.

The bill (S. 1094) for the widening of Sixteenth Street NW. at Piney Branch, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 32) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the extension of Newton Place NW. from New Hampshire Avenue to Georgia Avenue, and to connect Newton Place in Gass's subdivision with Newton Place in Whitney Close subdivision," approved February 21, 1910, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IDA A. CHEW.

The bill (S. 21) for the relief of Ida A. Chew, owner of lot 112, square 721, Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment of damages on account of changes of grade due to construction of the Union Station, District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW. was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1090) providing for guides in the District of Columbia and defining their duties was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that peddlers shall pay a license tax of $25 per annum, and guides shall pay a license tax of $5 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AID TO INDIGENTS IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 267) providing for assisting indigent persons, other than natives, in the District of Alaska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a committee amendment first, if the Senator will permit it, to be acted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before we proceed to that, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the Indians are omitted from this bill? Why is it that it applies only to such persons as are not Indians?

Mr. NELSON. I am unable to hear the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota fails to hear the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to know why it is that this language——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am just about to move to amend by striking out the words "other than natives." I had addressed the Chair first——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly; the Senator from Idaho has the floor if he desires it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have moved to amend by striking out in line 10, page 1, the words "other than natives," so that this fund will be distributable to all the indigents of Alaska.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I rose to ask about—to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the language "other than natives" had been put in?

Mr. NELSON. Under a law passed some years ago the license and occupation taxes collected in Alaska were set aside for the indigent people of Alaska. Twenty-five per cent was to be devoted to educational purposes—the establishment of schools—5 per cent for taking care of the insane, and the balance to the construction of roads and trails. Now, the object of this bill is to take 5 per cent of that Alaska fund and devote it to the care of the indigent whites. The natives of Alaska are taken care of under another appropriation. For years and years they have been under the charge of the Bureau of Education, which has had charge of them and taken care of them both in an educational way and otherwise, and a large appropriation is made for that purpose, disbursed and managed by the Bureau of Education. That is why this distinction was made.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, I do not understand that the natives will come within this classification or derive any benefit from that fund. This bill provides for indigent persons——

Mr. NELSON. Other than natives.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unfortunately the application is too wide. But the Department of Commerce and Labor have no special jurisdiction over the indigent. There is, in fact, to-day, as far as I can ascertain, no department of the Government that is charged with the responsibility for the care of indigent Indians or natives, and I know of no reason why they should not participate in this fund. The class of people over which the Department of Commerce and Labor have jurisdiction and for whom they administer funds does not include at all, as I understand, the indigent.

Mr. NELSON. The facts of the case are as I stated. The natives of Alaska, the Indians and the Esquimaux, have for years been under the charge of what is known as the Bureau of Education, now a part of the Department of Commerce and Labor. We make a large appropriation every year for the benefit of that bureau. They have established schools in Alaska and are taking care of the indigent natives under that appropriation, and have been for years. That is why this distinction is made, because they have a share of that fund while the whites have none at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is the Senator sure that that covers the Indians?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly it does. They have taken care of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. They take care of them in the way of educating them.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; they take care of them otherwise, providing them with hospitals and medical attendance and looking after them in every way. In fact, that is the only branch of the Government that is looking after the natives in Alaska.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unfortunately that seems to be true. I have had a number of complaints in letters that there was no specific department of the Government charged with the care of the indigent natives. They educate them; they provide for their education; they provide for them in health; but they do not provide for them when they have lost their health and are unable to take care of themselves.

Mr. NELSON. They take care of them as far as they can take care of them.

Mr. HEYBURN. There has been quite a demand that we establish——

Mr. NELSON. And the purpose of this fund, which is very limited, is to take care of those indigent white people, miners who get strapped, as it were, and are utterly helpless; and the criticism is that it is taken out of what we call the road-and-trail fund in Alaska, which is diminished to that extent. But the other fund, of which the Bureau of Education has charge, is an ample fund, and to my knowledge, derived from a visit to Alaska, the Bureau of Education is looking after that matter and using that fund for this purpose, and that is why we put in this amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. My attention was called to this within a few days by a man who lives in Alaska and who is here now, and he seems to think that we are unjustly discriminating against the natives in this matter. He is quite familiar——

Mr. NELSON. I think he is not quite familiar with the facts or the character of our appropriations in the past.

Mr. HEYBURN. He was speaking more from familiarity with the facts as they exist in the community in which he lives. He is a man who happens to have some sympathy with the natives in Alaska, and at one time was closely connected with their direct government. He suggested that in this matter they were being unfairly discriminated against.

I desired to call attention to this matter in order that the discussion may show always the position this matter occupied at the time of the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on Territories will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the governor, in his annual report, shall submit an itemized statement with proper vouchers of all expenditures under this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act, 5 per cent of all the moneys collected by the clerks of the district courts in Alaska for licenses and occupation taxes in the District of Alaska, now paid by the said clerks into the Alaska fund and to the treasurers of the several incorporated towns in Alaska, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and there held as a separate fund for the relief of the indigent persons, other than natives, in Alaska.

SEC. 2. That the said fund shall be disbursed upon the recommendation of the governor of Alaska to such persons and in such manner as he may direct: Provided, That the governor, in his annual report, shall submit an itemized statement with proper vouchers of all expenditures under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho offer an amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, I will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Withdraw it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to be sure that the Senator from Minnesota is sure that there is an adequate provision for the care of indigent natives.

Mr. NELSON. I will take pains by and by to show the Senator the appropriations that are made for the Bureau of Education.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I think the difficulty is more in the application and classification of the appropriation. It covers several classes of public service in connection with the Indians.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws the amendment he proposed to offer.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISHERIES TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The bill (S. 12) to give effect to the provisions of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the fisheries in waters contiguous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada, signed at Washington on April 1, 1908, and ratified by the United States Senate April 13, 1908, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked that the bill go over a few days ago. I think he withdraws his request to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is reached in regular order now.

Mr. JONES. As the Senator says, the bill went over at my request the other day. While I have not heard from my people, I have examined the bill very carefully and I do not see any objection to it, so I withdrew my objection.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 2, line 7, after the word "regulations," to insert "or amendment thereto," so as to read—

And provided further, That no further or other regulations or amendments thereto under the provisions of said treaty of April 11, 1908, shall be adopted or have the force or effect of law without action by the Congress of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER.

The bill (S. 1627) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across and over the Arkansas River, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "Oklahoma," to insert:

In accordance with and subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

So as to make the section read:

That the Muskogee & Fort Gibson Bridge Co., a corporation of the State of Oklahoma, its successors and assigns, are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across and over the Arkansas River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Muskogee, Muskogee County, Okla., in accordance with and subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the construction, maintenance, and operation of said bridge herein authorized shall be in all respects in accordance with and subject to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PARTIAL PAYMENTS ON NAVAL CONTRACTS.

The bill (S. 2003) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payments for work already done under public contracts was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall probably have no objection to the passage of this bill, provided it is understood that it does not recognize the right of one Congress to amend the record or journals of a preceding Congress; and it will be with that understanding in the RECORD; otherwise I shall oppose the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. This bill is a totally independent measure. It has nothing to do with the amendment of the appropriation act.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator makes that statement——

Mr. LODGE. It does not amend the appropriation act.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I am correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the floor, and I am correct, and I am going to read what is said in the report of the committee. It says:

> The provision relating to such partial payments contained in the bill as passed, which is said to have been included by a clerical error, and which it is proposed to repeal by joint resolution No. 1—

Which is the joint resolution I have referred to—> now before the Senate, authorizes, as you are aware, payments up to only 90 per cent of the value of the work already done.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment before I am interrupted, that I may present this matter squarely. Joint resolution No. 1, before the Senate, which we have passed over under my objection, undertakes to correct the records of the last Congress of the United States, on the ground that some clerk failed to perform a duty. That, as I said on a former occasion here when joint resolution No. 1 was up, is conceding the right of one Congress to correct the journals of another, because the bills that pass, in whatever shape they appear by the record, went to a conference committee of the two Houses and the conference agreed upon those measures; they went to the separate Houses and were signed by the presiding officers; they passed the scrutiny of the Committee on Enrolled Bills; and they went to the President and were signed. Now, to say that a subsequent Congress could come in here and say "we found memorandum lying around the room in which the committee met, which indicated that the enrolling clerks did not carry out faithfully the result of the action of the conference committee"——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. I want to finish this statement, because I want it to appear concisely in the RECORD. To say that because some one found some memorandum which would indicate that the enrolling clerks did not correctly or accurately carry out the conclusion of the committee of conference would open the door so wide that no legislation enacted by this body would be safe. You would not know when Congress adjourned what laws had been enacted, notwithstanding the fact that they bore the signatures of the presiding officers of the separate Houses and of the President of the United States. I am not alone in this matter. It is not my intention to allow, so long as it can be prevented, any action that will discredit the enactments of Congress at a previous session.

Now I am through with the statement, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Idaho as to the business of correcting bills of a previous Congress. I think it is an unsound practice. I am for this bill, which is a totally independent measure. The allusion in the Secretary's letter has of course nothing to do with the bill. It is merely showing the position in which the department was put by the proposition to amend the act that the bill as passed was in error.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me say to the Senator that I have no intention of objecting to this measure when it is understood and a matter of record that it is not a concession to the rule sought to be invoked to correct the record. It appeared in the report of the committee, although the Senator was quite sure there was nothing to justify it here. I have been very carefully through it.

Mr. LODGE. I am on the committee, and I have read the whole correspondence; I made inquiry at the Navy Department, and I know something about it. I do not know about as many subjects as the Senator from Idaho, but this particular one I do know about. It occurs in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which is not our legislation. Our legislation is the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is in the report of the committee from which the bill comes. I think this bill is a very proper measure. It provides for something that is necessary to be done and I have not failed to give it consideration. But I do not intend nevertheless to allow the bill to go through by default.

Now, Mr. President, with that understanding and that statement in the record, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. But if that is not the understanding, the bill will not be up for consideration.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the understanding of your committee, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHTS OF WAY IN CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 940) granting to the city of Los Angeles certain rights of way in, over, and through certain public lands and national forests in the State of California was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the calendar.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I gave notice Thursday last that at the conclusion of the morning business I should like to take up, and would take up, with the consent of the Senate, the resolution which I had introduced. With the permission of the Senator from Idaho, I will take up that resolution now and address myself to it.

Mr. BORAH. I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws his motion. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution now on the table.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar 4, Senate resolution by Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 6) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE April 6, 1911, as follows:

> Whereas the Senate, by resolution adopted on the 20th day of June, 1910, authorized and directed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and to report to the Senate whether in the election of said LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from said State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; and
> Whereas said committee, pursuant to said resolution, took the testimony of a large number of witnesses, reduced the testimony to printed form, and reported the same to the Senate, which was thereafter considered and acted upon by the Senate; and
> Whereas the Illinois State Senate thereafter appointed a committee to investigate like charges against WILLIAM LORIMER and to report to said State senate whether in the election of said LORIMER to the United States Senate corrupt methods and practices were employed and used; and
> Whereas as it appears from the published reports of the proceedings of the said Illinois State Senate committee that witnesses who were not called and sworn by the committee of this Senate appointed to investigate said charges have appeared before the said committee of the Illinois State Senate, and upon being interrogated have given important material testimony tending to prove that $100,000 was corruptly expended to secure the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That Senators JOHN D. WORKS, CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, GEORGE P. MCLEAN, JOHN W. KERN, and ATLEE POMERENE be, and they are hereby, appointed a special committee, and as such committee be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation, to employ stenographers, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to report the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not want to take any of the time of the Senator, but I simply wish to make an announcement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for that purpose?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I simply want to announce that at the proper time, when action is had on this resolution, I will offer as a substitute for the resolution that which I offered this afternoon and which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I take up the discussion of this matter this afternoon without the expectation of being able to conclude. The suggestion came to me during the session that Members of the Senate who had hoped to be present this afternoon are not here, and that a vote upon the resolution to-day would result in disappointment to many Senators who desire to be present.

I shall review briefly the "Lorimer case," as it is known to those Members of the Senate who voted upon it near the close of the last session. I contend that it shows the following undisputed and important facts:

On the 30th of April, 1910, a Democratic member of the Illinois General Assembly, who had voted for the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, a Republican, to the United States Senate, confessed that he was bribed, and received as a consideration for his vote the sum of $1,900.

The important details of this confession were published in practically every newspaper in the United States.

Shortly thereafter the grand juries in Cook and Sangamon Counties convened to investigate the charges.

Within a week following the publication of the first confession, and during the grand jury investigation, two other Democratic members of the Illinois Legislature, who had voted to elect WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate, confessed, under oath, to receiving Lorimer money under circumstances which can leave no doubt that they had been bribed to vote for LORIMER.

The confessions of those two members of the Illinois Legislature were likewise widely published in the newspapers of the country.

At the same time another Democratic member of the Illinois General Assembly, since deceased, who had voted to elect WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate, was proven to have been present when the Lorimer money was distributed, and proven afterwards to have had money in the same amount as the other members who confessed to receiving the bribes by sworn testimony before two grand juries.

Mr. President and Senators, I ask you to let your minds run back over that period covered by these extraordinary events. I ask you again to remember that the first charge made against WILLIAM LORIMER, impeaching his title to his seat as a Member of this body, was made and published broadcast throughout the land on the 30th day of April. The other confessions followed within a week or 10 days, and were printed in substantially every newspaper in the country.

Think of it, Senators! A Member of this great body charged with bribery by men who claimed to have received the money, their confessions published in every newspaper of general circulation from ocean to ocean as early as the 7th or 8th of May, and that Member contents himself with a brief, flippant, undignified newspaper interview and otherwise remains silent! Is there a man on this floor, other than that Senator, against whose honor there could be raised, against whose right to a seat on this floor there could be lodged, an imputation a fraction as strong as that who would not with all possible speed have hastened here at any sacrifice in order that he should be ready to rise in his place when next the Senate assembled and demand instant and complete investigation?

Have Senators who were Members of this body at that time forgotten that, as day after day went by, Members began to talk among themselves about LORIMER'S silence? The very atmosphere of this Chamber, Mr. President, became surcharged, as it were, with indignant protest—protest that the man whose title to a seat here with us was clouded, whose right to pass upon important affairs reaching into the lives of all the people of this country was questioned, still permitted the validity of his election to rest under a taint, and asked for no investigation.

May passed. Week after week went by. The 7th, the 8th, the 10th, the 15th, the 20th ran along, and no demand for a chance to meet his accusers face to face at the bar of this Senate. Yet everywhere throughout the country the press was demanding to know what it meant.

Mr. President, our forefathers gave us a system of government. They wrought out a plan by which and through which the people should have control. That plan gave to every citizen just the same part in the affairs of government as though he could go in person to the seat of government and directly participate in the making of those laws. What was it? They gave to him the opportunity to send somebody to make the law for him; to send somebody to truly represent him, to put his voice and his vote and his views upon all public questions into the legislation that was to govern the land. They called it representative government, Mr. President; it was representative government; it remained representative government just as long as the men so chosen were faithful to the trust committed to them. But, Mr. President, even a novice may see that the very moment some power comes between the citizen and his representative the whole plan, worked out in all its elaborate details by the great intellects that gave us our Government, fails utterly and completely.

This Government is representative only when each United States Senator and each Member of the other House is truly representative of the public interest. It becomes the worst subversion of the liberties of the people whenever the United States Senator or the Member of the House of Representatives, chosen as the representative of the people, betrays his trust. Can you conceive, Mr. President and Senators, of any man other than WILLIAM LORIMER holding such a trust as a Member of this great legislative body for weeks and weeks with his title impeached?

For three long weeks he made no answer here. He had more interesting, more important matters in hand than the question of his right to a seat here or the honor of the Senate. During these weeks every Member of this body, excepting the Senator whose title to a place was in question, cringed under the public criticism. During this time there was directed toward the Senate criticism from which it will take us a long time to recover.

I can not understand, sir, how any man fit to be here—in short, any man who was innocent—could permit such charges to be published and republished day after day and week after week without demanding a searching investigation by the Senate.

But LORIMER failed to demand investigation until, in the corridors and in the cloakrooms, were heard mutterings that unless the sitting Member spoke pretty soon somebody would have to speak for him.

Finally, on the 28th of May, another member of that legislature who had voted for him came to the altar of public opinion and bowed his knee in penitence, and said, "I, too, am guilty. I have sinned. I took the money." Then, and not until then, did the Senator from Illinois appear in the Senate to plead other and more important engagements and finally to proclaim his innocence. There are sitting here this afternoon men who have come to their feet quickly when the least intimation was made in some public print detrimental to their high sense of honor, and have denounced it, and purged themselves by the denunciation.

On the 28th of May, nearly four weeks after the first charges were made, while testimony against the sitting Member was accumulating week by week and day by day, WILLIAM LORIMER rose here to make his denial. I do not know who finally forced him to speak, but I can well imagine, Mr. President, that he could not wholly have escaped importunity and warning from friends here and elsewhere. It is not my province to invade the privacy of any committee room. My respect for his venerable colleague [Mr. CULLOM] warrants me in believing that he made appeal to the man who divided with him the honor of representing the great State of Illinois in this body; appealed to him no longer to remain passive under those charges, but for the honor of Illinois to speak. I do not know, but I think it is fair to that Senator, who has borne clean hands and maintained a clear record through a generation of time while a representative of the public interest, to believe that he could not, with his high ideals of public service, fail to demand that some sort of answer be made here to the awful charges that were daily published throughout the country, impugning the honor of the sitting Member from Illinois, and raising questions as to why the Senate of the United States sat by and permitted this thing to go on without some voice raised in denial or protest.

I do not mean to speak in disparagement of "senatorial courtesy," of that regard and consideration for the feelings of Members that is necessary to the best consideration of legislative measures and the best service to the public; but, Mr. President, it may be exalted into a fetich; it may be made to take the place of the ideal of service to the public. We do not owe more, nay, we do not owe so much, to our colleagues as we owe to those who have commissioned us here as the bearers of a sacred trust.

I do not think it is unfair to presume, Mr. President, that the Senator from Illinois waited until he was admonished that formal charges were to come; that they could not be averted; that they must be met; and that he had better at the eleventh hour secure whatever consideration he could by "demanding" an investigation.

And so, on the 28th day of May, the voice of the sitting Member was first heard in this Chamber in protest of innocence.

Mr. President, so long as I live I am going to cherish the belief and the conviction that he is the only Member of this body who would not, as soon as he could after any publication even intimating that he had gotten his seat through bribery, have taken the floor to defend his own honor. I do not believe there is a man here, from any State in this Union, who would not have been in the center aisle there, and whose voice would not have rung out from this Chamber demanding that those who had made the charges be called before a committee of this Senate and required to prove them. I am going to believe that there is not a man here, other than that one man, who would not have made full and complete answer to the Senate and the country early on the morning of the 30th day of April, 1910.

On the 7th of June formal charges were filed in the Senate by the president of the Voters' League of Illinois, and on the 20th day of June, 1910, 13 days thereafter, the Senate, by resolution, authorized and directed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the charges against WILLIAM LORIMER and report to the Senate whether, in his election, there were used or employed corrupt methods and practices.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, by subcommittee, pursuant to said resolution, took testimony in the case, reduced it to printed form, and reported it to the Senate on the 21st day of December.

Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, dissented from the report, and subsequently filed his conclusions based upon the record of testimony in the case, accompanying the same with a resolution declaring that WILLIAM LORIMER had not been duly elected a Member of the United States Senate.

Senator Frazier, of Tennessee, a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and a member of the subcommittee which took the testimony, withheld concurrence in the findings of the majority of the committee as set forth in its report and reserved, through the chairman of that committee, the right, if he saw fit, to subsequently file a minority report. It is my recollection that he did not file a minority report. But I think, running all through the debate up to the time when the sickness and death of his mother called him from our midst, his position upon this case was clearly defined as one of opposition to the views of the majority of the committee as completely as though he had made a formal report.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. I think the RECORD will disclose that Senator Frazier did file minority views.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is that true? Well, I am glad to make the correction. I cherish a very warm personal feeling for the ex-Senator from Tennessee, and very great respect, and regret that I had to be corrected to put him right on the record. I made what I thought was a very diligent search for his minority report, and was unable to find it.

Mr. SHIVELY. Probably I ought to observe that his views were not submitted at great length. They were submitted subsequently to the time when the views of the Senator from Indiana were submitted, and he agreed in the main with the views submitted by Senator Beveridge.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am under obligations both to the Senator from Indiana and to the Senator from Texas who have corrected me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend for a moment. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, one of the secretaries of the Senate has just been kind enough to place upon my desk the Journal of the Senate which makes note of the filing of the report of the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Frazier, and I read into the RECORD now the following:

Mr. Frazier asked and obtained leave to submit his views on the investigation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections instructed by resolution of the Senate of June 18, 1910, to conduct such investigation relating to certain charges against WILLIAM LORIMER, a Senator from Illinois, which were ordered to be printed as part 4 of Report No. 942.

I ask leave, Mr. President, at this point in my remarks to incorporate exactly what Senator Frazier filed as his views in that case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 942, pt. 4, 61st Cong., 3d sess.]

ELECTION OF SENATOR LORIMER.

Mr. Frazier, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following views, to accompany S. Res. 247:

It is with great reluctance that I differ with my colleagues on the subcommittee, but feeling impelled to do so, I beg leave to state briefly my views and conclusions in this case.

As I understand the precedents as established by the Senate and the other branch of Congress, and now recognized as the law governing such cases, they are:

First. If the proof establishes the fact that the Member whose seat is in question because of alleged bribery or corrupt practices resorted to in his election has himself been guilty of bribery or corrupt practices, or knew of or sanctioned such corrupt practices, he may be unseated without reference to the number of votes thus corruptly influenced.

Second. If the proof fails to show that the Member knew of or participated in or sanctioned such corrupt practices, then, in order to justify unseating him, the proof must show that enough members of the legislature voting for him were bribed or influenced by corrupt practices that deducting their votes from the total vote received by him would reduce his vote below the constitutional majority required for his election.

While there are some facts and circumstances in this case tending to show that Senator LORIMER may have heard of or known that corrupt practices were being resorted to, and while Senator LORIMER failed to avail himself of the opportunity of going on the stand as a witness and denying any such knowledge or sanction of corrupt practices, if any such were being practiced, still I am of the opinion that the testimony fails to establish the fact that Senator LORIMER was himself guilty of bribery or other corrupt practices, or that he sanctioned or was cognizant of the fact that bribery or other corrupt practices were being used by others to influence votes for him.

This being true, the question then arises, Was bribery or corrupt practices used by others in his behalf to influence votes for him; and, if so, were enough votes thus tainted with fraud and corruptly influenced when excluded to reduce his vote below the legal majority required for his election?

The Legislature of Illinois consisted of 204 members. There were present and voting on the occasion of the election of Senator LORIMER 202 members. A quorum of both houses being present, in my opinion, he must have received a majority of all those present and voting, or 102 votes, to have been elected. Senator LORIMER received 108 votes, or 6 more than necessary to elect.

The testimony taken by the committee satisfies me that four members of the legislature were paid money for voting for, or in consequence of having voted for, Senator LORIMER. One senator and three representatives admitted under oath before the committee that they were paid money, and their admissions and the facts and circumstances surrounding the transactions satisfy me that they received it as a bribe for or in consequence of their votes for Senator LORIMER.

The four self-confessed bribe takers implicate three other members of the legislature who voted for Senator LORIMER as the persons who bribed them. The testimony satisfies me that the three alleged bribe givers were guilty of that offense. To my mind the man who bribes another is as corrupt as the one who is bribed, and by his corrupt act of bribery he demonstrates the fact that he is none too honest to receive a bribe if offered him.

While the proof is not clear or conclusive that these three bribe givers were themselves bribed or corruptly influenced to vote for Senator LORIMER, when I take into consideration their corrupt conduct as bribers of others, together with all the facts and circumstances surrounding this case, I can not bring myself to agree with the majority of the subcommittee that their votes are free from taint or corruption. These three votes, added to the four confessedly bribed, would make seven tainted votes. Eliminate them, and the vote received by Senator LORIMER was less than a majority of the votes cast.

As stated above, it is with hesitancy and great reluctance that I differ with my colleagues upon the subcommittee, but I have felt impelled to do so after a most careful and, I trust, unbiased study of this record. In view of the fact that I appear to stand alone in the views herein expressed, I make no recommendation to the committee, but I do ask that members of the committee not members of the subcommittee carefully read all of the testimony before forming an opinion.

At the time the foregoing statement of my views and conclusions were filed with the full Committee on Privileges and Elections it was my purpose to file in the Senate a more elaborate statement, setting out in full the reasons which led me to the conclusions reached. It was also my purpose to offer with such statement a resolution declaring that Senator LORIMER was not legally elected Senator from the State of Illinois.

Since then, to wit, on January 9, 1911, the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, has filed an extended statement of his views, with copious reference to the testimony, and has offered a resolution of the character referred to. Hence it is not necessary for me at this time to file either the more extended report contemplated or the resolution. I am gratified that the Senator from Indiana concurs in the conclusion reached by me as to the election of Mr. LORIMER. In the resolution offered by him with respect thereto I concur.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have reviewed the facts in this case as they transpired, from the publication of the charges against WILLIAM LORIMER down to May 28, 1910. And I now invite your brief consideration of other testimony in this same connection.

It is a most extraordinary, a most remarkable fact in this case that some 30 members of the Democratic Party under some powerful influence were brought to the support of WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator.

Why was it that the so-called Democratic minority leader, Lee O'Neil Browne—shown by testimony in this case to have had $30,000 strapped around his body at the time that "Lorimer money" was being paid to legislators—why was it that Browne, a Democrat, at the crisis in LORIMER'S candidacy was able to muster so large a number of Democrats and deliver them in a body to elect a strongly partisan Republican United States Senator?

Mr. President, the answer to that question will disclose the evil forces combined in subverting representative government.

I have brought to the attention of the Senate the established fact that four Democratic legislators, three of them members of the lower house and one of them a member of the senate, admitted the receipt of sums of money varying from $1,000 to $2,500 in consideration for their votes for WILLIAM LORIMER.

Now, then, what does the testimony further prove? It proves:

That another Democratic member (Luke) was proven to have been present when the Lorimer money was distributed among the confessed bribe takers, and was proven afterwards to have had in his possession substantially the same amount and in bills of similar denomination;

That strong circumstantial evidence pointed to the payment of money to still another Democratic member of the legislature—members closely associated with those who confessed to having received Lorimer money;

That at least one other member of the legislature was offered money to vote for the sitting Member, and that others were approached and sounded on the subject;

That one other Democratic member of the legislature, as soon as the investigation was ordered, ran to cover and remained beyond the reach of a subpœna for many weeks;

That at least one other member of the legislature was induced to vote for LORIMER by the promise made by LORIMER in person that he—the member of the legislature—should control the appointment of postmaster at Jerseyville, Ill., where he resided, and that this promise was the only consideration for said legislator's vote for WILLIAM LORIMER;

That still another member, who refused to answer, because if he did and told the truth it would incriminate him, claimed his constitutional privilege and refused to testify before the Senate committee; and, finally,

That the Democratic leader of the general assembly who conducted the Lorimer campaign among the Democratic members swore that he did not know LORIMER "except to see him"; that he had a "mere passing acquaintance"—and I am quoting his words—"hardly a speaking acquaintance," which statement was flatly contradicted by LORIMER, who asserted on the floor of the Senate that he (LORIMER) "became very intimate with him (said Democratic leader) years ago"; that it was proven that throughout many weeks covering the period of the campaign for his election the sitting Member occupied a room either connected with or in close proximity to the room occupied by this Democratic leader, and that they were proven and admitted to have been in conference day and night throughout the whole period; that this Democratic leader was shown by the testimony to have been the custodian of the Lorimer bribe money, and to have personally paid certain sums of said money to certain members of the legislature.

Upon the testimony, Mr. President, I was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, and this conviction I know was shared by other Members of the Senate, that WILLIAM LORIMER had personal knowledge of the bribery which was committed to elect him to the United States Senate.

And, Mr. President, I pause here to remind Senators that the committee appointed to investigate this matter, or the subcommittee selected by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, so far departed from the authority and direction given to it by the Senate as to accept the statement of the attorney of a newspaper which took part in the examination of witnesses before that committee that he acquitted Mr. LORIMER of any guilty knowledge of bribery, and upon this to dismiss all consideration of the personal knowledge of the sitting Member of the bribery which had given him his seat.

I contended in the brief statement I made when this case was last before the Senate that at least I could not, reviewing all the testimony, bring myself for one moment to believe that the sitting Member had not been cognizant all the while of everything wrong which was done to secure him a seat in the Senate. If Senators who have not gone over the former record in the case should do so, they would find, page by page, evidence of the close association and the complete confidences which existed between Shurtleff, the Republican speaker, Lee O'Neil Browne, the leader of the 30 Democrats, and WILLIAM LORIMER, living together practically in the same room day and night for weeks and months while this contest was on, this thing and that thing being done to block the election of the candidate nominated at the primary by the voters of Illinois. These three boon companions, in either the same room or connecting rooms, were nightly with their heads together, plotting to defeat anybody who could be suggested.

When you come to consider the new testimony, you will see the bearing of all this scheming to prevent anybody from being chosen excepting this man, who represented not the Republican Party, not the Democratic Party, but something else which is intruding itself into the political life of the people of this country, secretly, masked, oftentimes difficult to hunt out, to define, to uncover, but it is here, Senators. If we close our eyes to it there are some millions of people in this country who do not.

And so I say, Mr. President, that upon the testimony I was convinced beyond all doubt—and in this conviction I know that other Members of the Senate share—that WILLIAM LORIMER had personal knowledge of the bribery which was committed to elect him to the United States Senate.

But, aside from his guilty knowledge of the bribery, I believe the testimony, beyond any possibility of doubt, proved that in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate corrupt methods and practices were employed, without which he would under no circumstances have been elected.

The resolution offered on the 9th day of January, 1911, by the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Beveridge, was submitted to a vote at the conclusion of the debate on March 1, 1911. The resolution was in the following form:

Resolved, That WILLIAM LORIMER was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

Upon this resolution the following Senators voted yea:

Bacon, Beveridge, Borah, Bourne, Bristow, Brown, Burkett, Burton, Chamberlain, Clapp, Clarke of Arkansas, Crawford, Culberson, Cummins, Davis, Dixon, Gore, Gronna, Jones, La Follette, Lodge, Martin, Money, Nelson, Newlands, Overman, Owen, Page, Percy, Rayner, Root, Shively, Smith of Michigan, Smith of South Carolina, Stone, Sutherland, Swanson, Taylor, Warner, Young—40.

The following Senators voted nay:

Bailey, Bankhead, Bradley, Brandegee, Briggs, Bulkeley, Burnham, Burrows, Carter, Clark of Wyoming, Crane, Cullom, Curtis, Depew, Dick, Dillingham, du Pont, Fletcher, Flint, Foster, Frye, Gallinger, Gamble, Guggenheim, Hale, Heyburn, Johnston, Kean, McCumber, Nixon, Oliver, Paynter, Penrose, Perkins, Piles, Richardson, Scott, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smoot, Stephenson, Thornton, Tillman, Warren, Watson, Wetmore—46.

When Mr. Frazier's name was called, Mr. CULBERSON said:

The Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Frazier, is absent at his home on account of the death of his mother. If present, he would vote "yea."

When Mr. TERRELL'S name was called, Mr. BACON said:

My colleague [Mr. TERRELL] is necessarily detained from the Chamber by personal illness. I desire to state for him, and upon his authority, that while he has been detained from the Chamber he has examined the record in the case and has made up his judgment, and that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Not voting:

Aldrich, Frazier, Lorimer, Taliaferro, Terrell.

Votes for the resolution, 40; against the resolution, 46; not voting, 5.

So the resolution of Mr. Beveridge was not agreed to, and WILLIAM LORIMER retained his seat.

Mr. President, the heat is so oppressive that I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to yield the floor at this time and resume again to-morrow after the morning business shall have been concluded. I have a certified copy of the testimony that has been taken by the senate committee of the Illinois Legislature. I have made an analysis of that testimony, and I want to submit to the Senate that analysis. It will take me some little time, and I could not by any possibility conclude to-night. Therefore, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will yield the floor at this time, with the request or with the notice that I will, if other business does not intervene, resume it to-morrow after the conclusion of the morning business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 23, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 20, 1911, was read and approved.

EXTENSION AND WIDENING OF COLORADO AVENUE AT KENNEDY STREET NW.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart by the rules for the consideration of legislation pertaining to the District of Columbia, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering House bill No. 8649.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering H. R. 8649, a District of Columbia bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8649, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of House bill 8649, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill and report, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8649) to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square No. 2718.

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1, of chapter 15, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within six months after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow

Street to Sixteenth Street with a width of 120 feet, according to the plan for the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square 2718, with a width of 90 feet: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extension and widening, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings herein provided for and for the payment of the amounts awarded by the jury as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8649) to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square No. 2718, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

This bill was introduced at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who submitted the draft of the same, with the following statement of their reasons for requesting its passage:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 15, 1911.

Hon. BEN JOHNSON,
Chairman of Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to inclose herewith a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square 2,718," and to request that it be enacted.

A blue print is inclosed upon which is indicated, in red, the land proposed to be condemned under the provisions of the bill. The estimated cost of this land is $17,538, and the bill provides that the total cost, together with the expenses of the condemnation proceedings, shall be assessed by the jury on the surrounding and abutting property as benefits.

The extension and widening of Colorado Avenue, as proposed in the bill, is believed to be very desirable. This avenue is becoming an important thoroughfare between Fourteenth and Sixteenth Streets, and should be opened to the full width of 120 feet, as laid down in the highway extension plans, before the increase in the value of the land or the erection of improvements would make the cost prohibitive. The land to be taken for the widening is divided into a number of small holdings, and it is impracticable to acquire it by dedication.

The widening of Kennedy Street is also desirable. This street is now open between Fourteenth and Sixteenth Streets with the exception of a small triangular part of lot 800, square 2718, and it has been found impossible to acquire this small portion by dedication. The District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912 contains an appropriation of $5,600 for grading and improving this street between Fourteenth and Sixteenth Streets, and unless this small piece of land is acquired the street can not be improved to its full width at Sixteenth Street.

Very respectfully,
BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By CUNO H. RUDOLPH, President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this, in the opinion of the committee, is one of the most innocent of the bills which come under the policy under which so many bills have been passed. The committee has been urged by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to take it up immediately and urge its passage, for the reason, as explained by them, that through an engineering mistake they have gotten onto private property a little bit, and the early passage of this bill will prevent a suit for damages against the District. It varies from many of the other bills, in that the District of Columbia must pay everything that is to be paid, and the general payment of it all will fall as assessments upon the neighboring property holders.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to extend my remarks for the purpose of placing a newspaper article in the RECORD—not on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, at this time the question of whether the Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee or in the House will vote to put wool, both washed and unwashed, on the free list or retain a fixed duty of some amount on it, or adopt what is called the sliding scale, is of such paramount importance that we should welcome aid and assistance in our efforts to arrive at a wise solution of the problem from any source.

With this purpose in view, I read a very able and illuminating contribution to this discussion from the pen of Mr. E. W. Newman, who writes under the nom de plume of "Savoyard," which I clipped from the Nashville Banner, a newspaper published in Nashville, Tenn.:

ABOUT FREE WOOL.

[By Savoyard.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1911.

There has been a deal of backing and filling over the proposed wool schedule of this Democratic Congress. Shall it be such a revision as John G. Carlisle would have made, or shall it be such a reaction as Samuel J. Randall would have given us? Shall the work of the Democratic Party of the Sixty-second Congress be Gormanized as was the work of the Democratic majority of the Fifty-third Congress? Shall we be overwhelmed in another wave of party perfidy and party dishonor?

If there is anything firmly established as a Democratic policy, it is free wool, for Schedule K is the citadel of protection and the duty on raw wool the keystone of the tariff arch. As long as we have taxed wool we will have a protective tariff, and the day wool goes on the free list the tariff wall will tremble, and soon thereafter it will fall. Carlisle said so, and Aldrich says so. Only a few days ago Mr. Aldrich said wool is the crux of the protective policy.

Why have two parties that favor a tax on wool? If both parties are for it, what was all that election row about last year? If the country is for a tax on wool, why did the people turn out the Republicans, who believe in it, and set up the Democrats, all of whose leaders of any sort of Democratic character since and including James R. Guthrie have advocated free wool?

The issue is plain and simple and sharp. The Democratic idea is free wool—and other raw materials he is bound to use—for the woolen manufacturer, and then compel him to compete with the foreign manufacturers by placing a duty strictly for revenue on his finished product. In the first place, that would give the people cheaper clothing, cheaper blankets, cheaper carpets, which would cheapen the cost of living enormously. Second, it would force the manufacturer to make woolens for the foreign trade, and that would enlarge his plant, give employment to more labor, supply a larger market to the woolgrower, and afford investment for more capital.

That is the Democratic idea. The Republican idea is a protective duty on raw wool, dyestuff, machinery, building material, and everything else the woolen manufacturer has to buy. Then pile up the protection on his finished product so as to give him a complete monopoly of the American market for woolens, such as clothing, hats, carpets, blankets, and everything made of wool. "But," says some fellow, "I'll never consent to free wool so long as the manufacturer has protection." No more will I. We propose to give him free raw materials and then take from him every scrap of protection not found in a tariff on finished products so constructed as to invite and stimulate importations of woolen goods. That was the position of Cleveland and Carlisle, of Morrison and Mills, of William L. Wilson and Henry G. Turner, and I'll say this: It has ever been the position of William J. Bryan. In my little way I have discharged as many shafts at "the Matchless" as anybody else. I was opposed to him when many of those now abusing him were in his train, shrieking "Noel!" and striving to touch the hem of his garment; but I always saw in Bryan a genuine tariff reformer of the Cleveland not the Gorman, of the Morrison not the Randall, type.

Strange to say, the manufacturer who buys from abroad 256,606,638 pounds of manufactured wool insists on paying tariff duties upon it to the amount of $21,128,728. Why? Because he knows that as long as there is a duty on wool 90,000,000 Americans, the most prodigal consumers in the world, will be forced to buy nearly everything made of wool from him, and the American people pay five times that $21,000,000 to protect him. That is what is the matter with this wool question. It is what the late Jonathan P. Dolliver said it was, a rascally and wicked conspiracy between the weavers and the shepherds to rob the American people and make living higher in price and greater in hardship.

When we shall succeed in smashing that cruel and remorseless combination of the shepherds and the weavers, the entire rascally tariff will go to the pot, and not before. And that is what the people ordered Congress to do last November, and why all this backing and filling is the mystery of it.

"Who but must laugh, if such a man there be?
Who would not weep, if Atticus were he?"

I have been about Congress for some 30 years, and it takes a heap to shock me, but I got a jolt the other day. A "Democratic" solon from Ohio said that he was elected by 10,000 majority. But if the Democrats put wool on the free list, he would be beaten by 10,000. Serene in his egotistic asshood, this fellow actually believes that it is more important to retain him in Congress than for the Democratic Party to redeem it solemn pledges of 40 years and upward.

I recollect 1892. A few moments after the Democratic Fifty-second Congress passed a bill putting wool on the free list Ohio voted for Grover Cleveland for President of the United States, and it was the only time Ohio has gone Democratic in a presidential year since 1852. The tariff was paramount in 1892 and the Democratic assault was made on the wool and woolen schedule. It is true that Cleveland got but one electoral vote from Ohio that year, but if every voter had understood the ballot he would have received every one of them.

Now it is common report that the Ways and Means Committee will put a duty on wool in order to carry Ohio. When you eat soup with the devil you must have a long ladle. Why stop at Ohio? Put the tariff high enough on steel and the Democrats would carry Pennsylvania. Michigan can be bought with a high duty on lumber. We would get Maine with a big duty on fish. Nay, make the duty out of sight on maple sugar and we might carry Vermont, that, it is said, will go Democratic when hell goes Methodist.

Just think of it! We can make the thing unanimous. Put the duties high enough and Aldrich and CANNON, PAYNE and DALZELL will come into the Democratic Party. Why, we can carry the G. O. P. that way. If we are going to fix a tariff to carry one State, let us fix it to carry all States. If the Democratic Party is to turn fat-fryer, let it go "a-cattin'" and sweep the whole platter.

And yet there is hope that the Democratic majority of the House will be Democratic, after all, and pronounce for free wool.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with favorable recommendation, provided there is to be no other debate.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask as to the locality where this street is to be opened. I understand it is a new street. I would like to know if the home owners or property owners are in accord with this proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. So far as we know, there is no objection; and if the gentleman heard the report read, he will have noticed that part of the money, $5,600, has already been appropriated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know anything about it at all. I am not sufficiently informed to act intelligently, and therefore I asked the question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I renew my motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the second reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] be put.

Mr. MANN. This is the reading of the bill for amendments, I suppose?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the second reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent that the second reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as this is the second reading of the bill, I think it ought not to be dispensed with.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if this is the bill that the committee passed on at its meeting the other day. I have come in a little late.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is the one.

Mr. DYER. The only one we passed on the other day at our meeting?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and reported unanimously.

The motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8649) to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square No. 2718, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, occasionally we read in a newspaper, or some one on the floor of this House makes the statement, that the farmers of the country are not alarmed or disturbed, fearing any serious effect by the approval of the Canadian reciprocity pact, and it is said that the real farmers are not concerned about it to any considerable extent.

I have heretofore asserted on the floor that I not only believed that this proposition would seriously affect the farmers generally throughout the country but particularly in the Northwest, and in doing so I believed that I not only represented the best interests of my constituents but that I represented their sentiments upon this question.

On the 19th instant there assembled at Aberdeen, S. Dak., several hundred actual farmers from throughout the State, who met in convention for the purpose of expressing their dissatisfaction and their disapproval of the Canadian reciprocity pact, and they formulated a communication addressed to the President and the Congress of the United States, and also adopted resolutions embodying their views on the measure. They also elected a large delegation that will reach Washington during the present week and will appear personally before the Finance Committee of the Senate to protest against the reciprocity bill. I am one of those who have entertained hopes that the measure will fail of passage in the other body, and that, in any event, when it returns here it will be materially amended, and that therefore this House will again be given an opportunity to pass upon it. For that reason and for the purpose of giving greater publicity to the attitude of the farmers of South Dakota on the question, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the following communication appearing in the Aberdeen Daily News of the 19th, being the communication adopted, as before stated:

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

This convention, held at Aberdeen, S. Dak., on May 19, 1911, representing the agricultural and stock-raising interests of the State of South Dakota, respectfully and earnestly and unanimously protests against the passage of the so-called Canadian reciprocity act.

The farmers of these Northwestern States have loyally supported a high-protective tariff for the purpose of developing the manufacturing interests of the United States, and protecting their employees against the cheap labor of other lands, and have willingly paid the increased prices for manufactured products occasioned thereby. The result has been that our manufacturing development has become the wonder of the world, and the employees in these protected industries have received far higher wages than in any other country on earth.

We also believed that the time would come when the immense development of these manufacturing interests would furnish a home market for the products of agriculture at higher prices than if sold abroad in competition with the cheap labor of Russia, India, and Argentina. That day has now practically arrived, and food consumption has nearly caught up with agricultural production, and although we still export a small portion of our agricultural products, our domestic prices of oats, barley, wheat, flax, and corn and other agricultural products (except in cases of unusually large crops) will average considerably higher than across the Canadian line with equal freights to Liverpool.

DEVELOPMENT OF CANADA.

The Canadian northwest has barely begun to develop. Its production of grain, according to the careful estimates of Canadian and English statisticians, partially corroborated by our own Department of Agriculture, can be ultimately increased to several times the present total product of the entire United States. Canadian possibilities has already taken from us thousands of American citizens, who, with their millions of capital, should have been encouraged to develop the resources of our own country rather than expatriate themselves to a foreign land. The adoption of this treaty will stimulate this exodus of our American citizens and encourage Canadian development at our expense by allowing the entire Canadian surplus free access to our markets, and thereby put our farmers into direct competition with the Canadian producer, who has virgin soil, much cheaper and more productive land, pays lower wages and lower taxes and a lower tariff upon manufactured products, and has equal, if not better, facilities for reaching the world's markets. The inevitable result will be that the prices of our grains will again fall to the world's level, and be fixed at Liverpool, as in former years, instead of in Chicago or Minneapolis, and will again come into competition not only with Canadian products but with the cheap labor of all the grain-exporting countries of the world.

The rapid development of the Middle West years ago was a fearful blow to the agricultural interests of New England and the Eastern States, resulting in abandoned farms, depreciated land values, and discouraged farmers. Who is bold enough to say that history will not repeat itself and that similar results may not befall the farmers of the Middle West as the ultimate result of the free admission of grains from the "future granary of the world," the great Canadian northwest.

ENGLAND'S EXAMPLE.

Free-trade England does not protect its farmers and the result is that more than 3,000,000 acres of its farming land have gone out of cultivation during the last generation as the result of the free importation of the farm products of the world. The great Bismarck declared that the prosperity of the United States was based upon its protective tariff, and Germany thereupon inaugurated and has ever since maintained the protective system, both upon its agricultural as well as its manufacturing interests, and has made marvelous progress. France also protects its farmers against injurious foreign competition. Are not the farmers of the United States as worthy of protection as those of France and Germany, or the employees and proprietors of the manufacturing interests of the East

We resent the so-called farmers' free-list bill as a sop to the outraged farmers of the Northwest, and declare our conviction that such a law will be of little, if any, benefit to us. The farmers of South Dakota do not ask for the admission free of duty of agricultural implements, supplies, or any manufactured products which can be made in the United States with American labor at a reasonable cost and sold at reasonable prices.

BELIEVE IN PROTECTION.

We not only wish protection for ourselves, but we unselfishly favor the protection of every producer of the United States in the production of goods and other products made or grown in competition with the cheap labor of other lands. If, however, the protection now enjoyed by us upon our farm products is taken away there will be little advantage to us in a home market, as the price of grain will be the same in cities upon both sides of the international line, less freight to Liverpool. And while making no threats as to our future political action, we frankly suggest to the employees and proprietors of the protected industries of the East, whom we shall hold chiefly responsible in case of the passage of the reciprocity bill, whether they expect us to favor the continuance of a high protective tariff for their exclusive benefit when they have selfishly taken away all protection upon the products of our farms?

It is only during the last few years that farm lands have materially increased in value and agriculture has been even fairly prosperous. The farmer is deprived of many of the advantages, comforts, and conveniences of city life. His entire family are at work from daylight until dark and know no eight-hour day. A large investment in horses and machinery is required. After allowance of wages for labor no greater than paid to the ordinary laboring man, and the wear and tear of farm machinery, repairs to fences and buildings, the payment of taxes, and the expense of sufficient fertilization of the ground to prevent deterioration, the average net return upon the capital invested will not amount to one-half as much as the ordinary merchant or manufacturer expects to receive upon his investment.

THE PROFITS SMALL.

Had it not been for the great increase in farm values and temporarily increased prices of farm products of recent years, a large percentage of grain farming would have been conducted at a loss instead of a profit. Even with the unusually high prices of farm products last year the average net return upon developed farms was very small.

The avowed object of the passage of this bill is to reduce "the cost of living"; but while its effect will undoubtedly be to lower the price received by the farmer, it is extremely doubtful if the consumer will receive any substantial benefit. At the time this treaty was negotiated we enjoyed an advantage over the Canadian producer of about 12 cents per bushel on northern wheat, 30 cents per bushel upon barley, and 25 cents per bushel on flax. We had no advantage upon oats on account of excessive production, making it necessary to market abroad an unusually large surplus. This advantage is so small that it does not affect the price paid by the ultimate consumer for a loaf of bread, a glass of beer, or a gallon of paint. The blow will fall upon the agricultural interests alone, and with little probable benefit to the ultimate consumer, who is seldom required to pay less than 50 per cent profit upon the price received by the producer. The real cause of the alleged high cost of living is the excessive cost of transportation and the needless waste in distribution, which often more than doubles the price between the original producer and the ultimate consumer.

The tariff upon hides was removed, to the great detriment of the stock raiser and immense loss of customs duties formerly paid upon imported hides, and the result has been an increase in the price of shoes and leather instead of a reduction, as confidently promised at the time the tariff was removed. The reciprocity act removes all protection upon farm products, and the next step proposed is the abolition of the tariff upon wool, which will complete the removal of the last vestige of protection enjoyed by the northwestern farmers. What have we done to merit such treatment by the people of the United States?

The Canadians are as loyal to the English king to-day as they were in Revolutionary days. They have given and will continue to give, even after the passage of this act, a great advantage to English manufactured products over those of the United States. They buy our goods only because of price, quality, and speedy delivery.

There is no advantage likely to result to any portion of the people of the United States that will offset in the slightest degree the disastrous effects upon agriculture which are absolutely sure to follow the passage of this bill. One-third of the entire population of the United States is engaged in agriculture. When their prosperity is menaced, every avenue of trade and commerce will be affected, and the mad rush from our farms to the congested cities will again recur. The depressed prices of farm products certain to result from the passage of this act will have a similar effect upon agriculture as a complete abolition of our protective tariff laws would have upon the manufacturing industries of the East protected thereby.

STAND IS COMMENDED.

The following resolution was also adopted:

"We heartily commend the position taken by our delegation in the House and Senate in opposing this unjust treaty, and also the papers of our States, especially the Aberdeen Daily News, and Dakota Farmer and other weekly papers which advocate a square deal for everybody."

SIXTEEN DELEGATES CHOSEN.

Following the adoption of the resolutions the convention took up the matter of choosing delegates, and decided to send the following men to Washington to represent the State of South Dakota to oppose the treaty:

J. C. Simmons, Hugh N. Allen, C. A. Russell, Aberdeen; W. H. Wenz, Bath; E. J. Mather, A. W. Krueger, J. D. Reeves, Groton; E. P. Ashford, Rondell; J. D. McKenna, Bradley; E. E. Clapp, Raymond; Otto Johnson, Redfield; W. B. Burr, Selby; J. W. Parmley, M. P. Beebe, Ipswich; A. E. Chamberlain, Brookings; W. H. Lyon, Sioux Falls.

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, some of us who have come to Congress for the first time, and who by virtue of the "dice-shaking" custom which prevails in the selection of seats, have been relegated to the suburbs of the House floor, have sat here throughout this long debate listening as best we could, and hoping against hope that something might be said or done that would justify the action of those Members on both sides of the floor of this House who oppose the immediate and unconditional admission of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union under the constitutions they have adopted. [Applause.] It would appear to us that those two western Territories, great in area, peopled with an intelligent, progressive, law-abiding and liberty-loving people, rich in natural resources, and possessing all that is essential to statehood, are being made the unfortunate victims of a political "gamble" in which their "hold card" has been seen, and their opponents, Democrats and Republicans alike, are each "raising" the other while the Territories "stand pat" and lose their "ante." [Applause.] They have been knocking at the door of Congress asking admission into the Union for years, but lest one party or the other might benefit by their admission and the political complexion of the lawmaking bodies of this country be changed, their admission has been postponed on one pretext or another, until now, regardless of parties or politics, the great mass of fair-minded American people demand their admission, and their admission at once. The majority Members of this House are entitled to no great credit if this resolution is adopted (as it undoubtedly will be) because it defers action and asks the people of Arizona to vote again on the very questions they once adopted by a vote of more than three to one, or, to be specific, 12,187 for and 3,822 against. Is that Democratic? Is that in accordance with your ideas of Democracy? You ask the people of New Mexico, after they have presented a constitution republican in form and adopted it at a general election by a vote of more than two to one, or, to be more specific, by a vote of 31,742 for and 13,339 against, to vote on it again? Is that Democratic? Is that in keeping with your cherished ideas of Jeffersonian Democracy of which we hear so much? [Applause on the Republican side.]

You say to the people of Arizona: "You have adopted a constitution which contains a provision for the recall of all elective officers by a decisive vote. It is republican in form and democratic in spirit, but we, as the great censors of all that is purely democratic, do not believe that you meant what you said by your votes, and are going to make you 'toe the mark' and try it again."

You claim to believe in the people. I have heard this Chamber echo and reecho with the eloquence of great men and have seen great beads of perspiration course down the cheeks of the orators while copious gushing tears dimmed their vision in passionate appeals made in behalf of the down-trodden masses, while the sanctity of the ballot was upheld and the "majority rule" on all questions was held to be the guiding spirit in all that savors of a pure democracy. [Applause.]

Why this change of heart at a time when you can respond by bowing to the will of the majority? All on this side of the House are ready to act at once as regards the admission of New Mexico, and many of us on both sides are ready to do the same with Arizona, regardless of our individual opinions, on the various articles and sections of the two constitutions. I am speaking my individual opinion, not as a partisan, but as a plain representative of the people who has no "axes to grind," alliances to make, favors to ask, or fears to constrain him.

The Constitution of the United States has said in the following words:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

It is admitted by all that Congress has the right under the law to admit one or both if it deems best, or to deny one or both admission if it sees fit so to do. What, then, should actuate Congress in the admission of States into the Union? In my humble opinion whenever a Territory of the United States of sufficient area and resources and peopled with a class of people of such a standard of citizenship as to conduct the limited affairs of a Territorial form of government in a manner becoming an enlightened people, who are intelligent, moral, law-abiding, and liberty loving and have complied with the terms of the enabling act of Congress by the adoption of a constitution prepared by a convention duly elected, organized, and held in compliance with the terms of Congress, and subsequently ratified by a majority vote of the people of the Territory, it is not only entitled to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, but should be admitted, and admitted at once. But the majority Members in their report say:

The committee further reports that it has had said constitution under consideration and finds the same to be republican in form; that they make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color and that they are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or the Declaration of Independence; and that they are in conformity with the provisions of the enabling act.

Then why does not the committee in the discharge of its duties and without delay adopt House joint resolution 14, as introduced April 4, 1911, by Mr. FLOOD of Virginia? Is it because the committee does not believe in giving to any people the right to insert in their constitution the right of recall of members of the judiciary? The people of Arizona said by their votes that—

Every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office.

The majority members in their report say:

The committee has also in its substitute resolution suggested an amendment to the proposed constitution of Arizona providing that the judiciary of the new State shall not be subject to recall from office by popular vote.

They say, however, apologetically to the people of Arizona:

This amendment is not made mandatory, but is merely proposed and is to be submitted to the electors for their ratification or rejection at the first general election for State and county officers.

"O Consistency, thou art a jewel."

The views of the minority, signed by WILLIAM H. DRAPER, FRANK E. GUERNSEY, J. N. LANGHAM, FRANK B. WILLIS, WIL-LIAM H. ANDREWS, and RALPH H. CAMERON, are set forth plainly and explicitly in a joint resolution, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Territory of Arizona be admitted into this Union as a State with the constitution which was formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of Arizona elected in accordance with the terms of the enabling act, approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified voters of the Territory of Arizona at an election held according to law on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1911, upon the fundamental conditions, however, that article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona in so far as it relates to the "recall of public officers" shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers, and that the people of Arizona shall give their assent to such construction of article 8 of the said constitution.

The views expressed by these men are plain, and the people of Arizona need have no question as to how they stand upon the recall when applied to the judiciary. We do not agree with them in their stand as dictators to the people of that Territory as to the precautions they may take in their constitutions to safeguard the people against an incompetent, unjust, and unscrupulous judiciary any more than do I agree with the majority in compelling the people to submit the question of recall of the judiciary a second time at an election. The minority members have, however, met the question squarely, while the majority have not. The views of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEDEMEYER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. YOUNG] are, to my way of thinking, the most in harmony with the intention of the framers of the Constitution of the United States. Their views are as follows:

We agree to the minority views as far as they relate to New Mexico. We disagree to the minority views so far as they relate to Arizona. We are in favor of both Territories coming into the Union as States under the constitutions adopted by the people of both New Mexico and Arizona, pursuant to the enabling act, by large majorities. We are for the passage of House joint resolution 14, as introduced April 4, which joint resolution as originally introduced we favor without amendment.

Many able and convincing arguments, pro and con, have been delivered in this House on the question of the soundness of the recall proposition when applied to the judiciary, but I am unwilling to take the stand that this Congress should invade the province of the electors of Arizona or any other Territory and dictate to them the tenure of their judicial offices and the manner in which judicial officers or any other officers may be removed from office as a condition precedent to their admission into the Union. That is a right inherent in themselves.

It is a right guaranteed the people by Articles IX and X of the Constitution of the United States. Article IX reads as follows:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Article X reads:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

My reasoning leads me then to this conclusion. That the power of Congress to dictate to the people of a State the manner in which they shall elect and maintain their judiciary and the only manner in which they may be removed, is not and never was delegated to the United States, and is not and never was prohibited by it to the States themselves.

It must, then, be a power reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote now, and vote for the immediate admission of both Arizona and New Mexico as States into this Union.

Let us add two more States to that old flag, the merest mention of which should bring to the mind of every true American the deepest thoughts of patriotism, and make us all brothers of one great patriotic Nation, whose flag is known in every land and upon every sea, and whose graceful folds unfurled to the breezes command the respect and admiration of the entire civilized world.

Hail blessed flag, three cheers to thee,
The emblem of sweet Liberty!
Long wave aloft, retain thy hue,
Those blessed colors red, white, and blue!

[Loud applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to yield some more of his time now?

Mr. LANGHAM. I should like to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the power to admit States into the Union is said to be discretionary. It is political in its nature, and is vested in the political branch of the Federal Government, and is not subject to control by any other branch or department of the Government. In that sense it is a discretionary power. The courts can not by any sort of proceeding compel the Congress to admit Territories to statehood or to perform any other of its multiform functions under the Constitution. It is discretionary, perhaps, in a broader sense, in the sense that Congress is the judge of the wisdom of admitting new States into the Union, but that discretion is not an arbitrary one, judged from the standpoint of public policy. It should not be prompted by considerations that are whimsical or capricious. It is a reasonable discretion. Congress should investigate the conditions of an applicant for statehood. It should consider the area of the Territory, its resources, its population not only as to numbers but as to character, homogeneity, and political experience, and determine, upon the whole, whether the proposed Territory is capable of assuming the responsibilities of statehood. It is not a local question altogether. Every State in the Union has a vital interest in the question as to what new States shall be admitted, because every State sends Representatives and Senators to Congress to assist in making laws for the entire country.

The question as to the fitness of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico for statehood, it seems to me, was primarily settled in the enabling act. When Congress made that law it decided that these Territories were fit for the duties and responsibilities of statehood, and then, in accordance with precedent, it proceeded to enumerate a number of conditions that should be performed before statehood would be granted. There is a persistent disposition on the part of Congress, manifested in almost every instance when new States are admitted into the Union, to prescribe special conditions for the new State government.

The Constitution of the United States declares, in effect, that State governments shall be republican in form. This, properly construed, means that they shall be republican in spirit as well as in form. A republican government is understood to be a popular government that performs its various functions through agents, officers, and representatives selected by the people for that purpose, as distinguished from a democratic government in which the people conduct the public affairs themselves. A republican government is predicated upon the representative idea, and State governments must be republican in spirit as well as in form. The constitutions that are offered to Congress for consideration now by these Territories seem to comply in a general way with the enabling act. They do not conflict with the Federal Constitution. They are republican in form. A question has occurred to my mind in the study of this measure as to whether a State might be admitted into the Union with a constitution providing for the making of its laws by the institution of the initiative and referendum, without any provision for a representative legislative body at all. I shall address myself to that problem a little later on in the course of my remarks, but I will say here that, in my judgment, that kind of a constitution would not be republican in either form or spirit, but these constitutions are republican in form because they both provide for representative government. I do not believe in injecting into the fundamental law of a new State conditions and provisions that are not adapted to the social and political development of its people. I do not believe that Massachusetts, with her 250 years of political life and experience, should determine the conditions for Arizona altogether from her own standpoint. We should be somewhat liberal in approving a constitution for a new State, but the fundamental conditions underlying republican government should be insisted upon, as they always have been and probably always will be.

With the admission of these two Territories into the Union every foot of territory in continental United States, if I may use that term, outside of Alaska will then be under the control of State governments, excepting the District of Columbia. The problem of statehood perhaps will not arise to vex Congress for a number of years to come, although I understand Hawaii is preparing to make application for admission into the Union as a State.

Mr. MANN. It has made application recently.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It has already made application. In connection with Hawaii's application some very interesting problems will doubtless arise. In the course of this discussion, in colloquies that have occurred on the floor, there have been banterings back and forth across the main aisle as to which party was ready and willing to grant statehood to these Territories first, as if the greatest virtue was in the party that offered to grant statehood at the earliest date. I claim for the Republican Party the virtue of first acting with discrimination. It is not the party that is first willing to do a thing, but the party that has the discriminating sense to know when the time is ripe, when conditions are ready to do the act, and will do it at the proper time.

The questions of education, political experience, social institutions, permanence of population are among the things to be considered in determining whether Arizona and New Mexico are ready for statehood and whether, from the standpoint of the other States, statehood should be extended to them.

WHAT CONSTITUTIONS SHOULD CONTAIN.

These Territories have presented constitutions that contain many good provisions. If I were making the constitutions, I would omit some things from both of them and probably embody provisions not contained in either of them. The only criticism the Committee on the Territories makes of the constitution of New Mexico so far as its report discloses is that it is not sufficiently liberal in providing for its own amendment. I have no sympathy with that criticism of the New Mexico constitution. What is the constitution of a State or of a country? It is the organic law which defines the powers and outlines the framework of the government. It should impose limitations upon the various branches of government and safeguard the rights and liberties of the citizens. It should provide for the stability of free institutions. A constitution is a port of safety in time of storm; it is a city of refuge in the face of popular frenzy. It should not be a vehicle to carry legislation. The legislative body should make the laws for the people. The constitution should be made by the people to control and govern the government it creates.

It ought not to be amended too easily. There has been much said during the course of this debate about the rights of the people. The RECORD abounds in fulsome praise and adulation of the people, but most of it bears the earmarks of cheap lip service designed to cover the barbs in the political fishhooks. I hope we are all interested in the welfare of the people, but we should show that interest in a more substantial way than in high-sounding rhetoric. This Government, with its splendid institutions, is our common heritage, and we are part of the people, and share with them the benefits of popular government. But stability of government is one of its most beneficent features, and that can not exist when the organic law changes with every change of the moon. A constitution that can be amended as easily as an act of the legislature will soon lose its sanctity.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, there is great virtue in political sentiment. We cherish the memory of the patriots who founded this Government, and of the brave men who preserved it against destruction. Their sacrifices should inspire us to a nobler patriotism. A people that has no sentiment, that has no reverence for its historic characters and institutions, is far down in the scale of civilization. A constitution ought to embody general principles; it ought to outline the powers of the Government and impose limitations upon the exercise of those powers wherever it is for the welfare of the people to do so, and the government created thereby should work out the details of legislation and administration in accordance with the principles and limitations contained in the constitution.

LEGISLATION IN THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Chairman, the strongest evidence against the fitness of Arizona for statehood is that contained in the constitution itself, in the legislation it embodies. The convention that framed that constitution put much in it in the way of detail that should have been left to the legislature, in the belief, perhaps, that in their anxiety for statehood the voters would approve it. Those items of legislative detail are embalmed in the instrument and can not be changed except by amendment to the constitution. If you make the constitution an instrument of legislation, of course you must make it easy of amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield.

Mr. JACKSON. I simply wanted to inquire whether the gentleman would favor leaving these legislative matters out of the constitution and allowing the judges to put them in afterwards, or whether he would think it was better to put more in the constitution in the way of limitation?
